"Mr. Geo. Grombacher, of the Spokane Film Exchange is doing a splendid business. Mr. Grombacher is a brother-in-law of Frank Bailey of the Montana Film Exchange, Butte, Mont. In addition to their exchange business they own the four moving picture theatres in that city. The miners are very fond of that form of entertainment and as the work in the copper mines is done in three shifts of 8 hours each, there are men on the streets at all hours of the day and night looking for entertainment, so they keep the theatres well patronized from early morning until late at night.

"After leaving Butte I interrupted my trip for five days and went through Yellowstone Park, which is one of the wonders of this country. If the geysers, wild animals and scenery there could be properly reproduced in moving pictures it should make a great hit all over the country. Very few Americans appreciate the wonders of our National Park. It seems to me that if it were in the hands of private individuals instead of the government, it would have been advertised in some such manner long before this.

"In Ogden, W. W. Hodkinson, of the Progressive Motion Picture Co. and in Salt Lake City, Mr. Max Florence, of the Florence Film Exchange, are dividing their time between their film exchanges and the chain of theatres which they operate in their respective cities. The most notable feature in connection with the theatres operated by these capable managers and one which other exhibitors and exchanges would do well to consider carefully, is that they change their pictures but once a week and still do a most profitable business. Changing pictures once a day is quite generally discouraged throughout the west. In some places changes are made twice a week, but the average is three times a week. By following this policy the subjects released by the manufacturers are not rapidly exhausted, the exhibitors are never in danger of having to repeat and the public does not so soon tire of this form of amusement.

"In Denver, Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines and Minneapolis business was a little bit quiet, due to the extreme heat they have experienced during the most of July and the first of August, but many new theatres are in the course of erection and prospects for business this fall are very good.

"It is interesting for an Easterner to observe the advanced ideas prevailing among the exhibitors in the West. The average theatre is much better than those in Eastern cities. They give more attention to the comfort of their patrons and the theatres as a rule are better ventilated and higher wages are paid, thus insuring better help.

"One very fine effect I noticed in the Princess Theatre, Vancouver, B. C., which I had

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

IT has long been recognized by everyone in the licensed ranks, who has the lasting welfare of the moving picture industry at heart, and who believes in and strives for its development along lines that will involve the least friction and bring the greatest good to the majority of those interested, that it is unwise for an exchange to engage in the exhibiting department of the business. Indeed the word, "hazardous," might better be employed than "unwise," as it is certain, from the disposition of men in their affairs, that an exchange man who is interested in a theatre, or a number of theatres, will naturally—no matter how honest he may be in his intentions—safeguard and favor it, or them, at the expense of competing houses. Even if it were possible for an exchange man to follow strict indiscrimination, as between his own houses and those of competitors, it would still remain certain that those competitors would be loath to give him credit for it, and that friction and dissatisfaction would result.

While in the licensed business there is no rule that prohibits an exchange from engaging in the exhibiting department, yet it is well understood that there has been an unwritten regulation which recommends that the exchange man confine himself strictly to his end of the picture business and the exhibitor to his field. When the General Film Company was formed, it came out clearly for this policy, as the articles of incorporation prohibit the company from engaging in the exhibition of moving pictures or from owning or operating theatres.

It can be readily seen how an exchange, interested heavily in theatre property and controlling the rental of film in a territory, could work havoc with the future prospects of the licensed business in that territory. Should the controlling men be of the get-rich-quick brand, that havoc would be wrought all the more quickly. With no eye and no care for the future growth of the picture business, such men could establish a tyrannous rule over competing exhibitors and either ruin them or drive them over to the "independents." And, if it were not for the watchful eye and the strong guiding hand of the M. P. P. Co., the licensed exhibitor might have suffered from such abuses. Where he has suffered, temporarily, that company has stepped in and restored order and reinstated him in his rights.

The advent of the General Film Co., is another long step forward in the improvement of conditions, and the licensed exhibitor can look forward, with increased hope, to a richer and more certain harvest than he has ever yet reaped.

The St. Louis Situation.

A. D. Flintom, of the Yale Film Exchange, of St. Louis, was in the city Wednesday, August 17, and returned the same evening to the Missouri metropolis.

Desirous of getting for Film Index readers a clear account of the present conditions of the picture business in that city, I imposed on Mr. Flintom's good nature by monopolizing his time for several minutes in a cozy corner of the Palmer House, to which he had invited me "to see a man."

In the first place, I learned that the Yale Film Exchange is located on the fifth floor of the Navarre building, at 604 Chestnut street, where nine rooms are occupied by the office force and supplies. I also learned that the Yale Film Exchange is a corporation and that Mr. Flintom directs its policy and conducts its business. Mr. Flintom formerly controlled the Yale Film Exchange of Kansas City, which he sold to the General Film Co., a short time ago.

On the cancellation of the licenses of the O. T. Crawford and Western Film Exchanges of St. Louis, Mr. Flintom made application for a license in that city, at the urgent request of licensed exhibitors in St. Louis and adjacent territory. On July 20, he was notified by the M. P. P. Co. that the license had been granted, and, on July 25, the offices were opened in the heart of the picture theatre district.

Mr. Flintom told me that exhibitors in St. Louis and tributary territory were overjoyed at his taking hold of the St. Louis business, as neither of the former exchanges had bought sufficient of the licensed output to give patrons a satisfactory service. Besides, it had developed that the exchanges referred to had become interested in a number of theatres and tent shows, and it was reported widely that these houses and out-of-door shows were being favored at the expense of competing houses.

When the Yale Exchange opened, Mr. Flintom found that the Crawford and Western Film Exchanges had been serving 182 customers in St. Louis and outside. At the end of the third week, the Yale had 150 of these patrons on its books, or five-sixths of the entire business. The one-sixth remaining still take service from the former exchanges, due, it is said, to the interest held by Mr. Crawford in various houses.

At the present time the Yale is doing a weekly rental of between $5,000 and $6,000 as against $7,500 weekly, formerly done.

Mr. Flintom assured me that, practically, every exhibitor in St. Louis is convinced of the superiority of the licensed product, and that all are anxious to get it. He also stated, confidently that in a short time he will be furnishing service to every licensed house in St. Louis, with the exception of those under the direct control of the former exchanges, or who are under binding obligations to them.

Again referring to the jubilance of licensed exhibitors over the change, Mr. Flintom said that they are especially gratified that they are now served by an exchange that is not interested in the exhibiting field, and where the conflict between similar pictures will be avoided. The latter benefit will contribute to the increased profits of competing houses in the same neighborhood, which formerly suffered through conflicting service. Besides, the buying of many prints of the same subject, in addition to the entire output of licensed manufacturers, will ensure the best possible service to every exhibitor, according to his needs.

Mr. Flintom stated that the Yale, at the present time, is buying two prints for every one formerly purchased by his predecessors and that the buying volume will be increased still further, as occasion demands it.

Mr. Flintom speaks highly of the type of picture theatres in St. Louis. He stated that 162 houses are at present in operation and that the majority are high class and beautiful structures some of them costing $50,000. The patrons of the better class theatres, in the residence districts, number among them the best people in the city and they keep as well posted on picture entertainment as they do on other amusements.

Among the many able business men attracted by the moving picture industry, A. D. Flintom stands high. He has had 14 years experience in banking and is now the largest stockholder in one of the new and most successful banks of Kansas City. He has control of the finest business corner in that city, at 12th street and Grand Ave., holding a nine-year lease. He is president of the Kansas City Leasehold & Improvement Co., and holds a similar office with the 12th Street Leasehold & Improvement Co., of Kansas City, which holds a number of valuable 99 year leaseholds on desirable business property. He is also director of the Harris Investment Co. of Kansas City, which is largely interested in Texas lands, besides being a prominent stockholder of several banking institutions. Finally, Mr. Flintom, although leaving the item until the close of our brief chat, prides himself on being a member of the Sigma Chi fraternity, of Kansas University chapter.

With such business experience and prominence, added to the sound conservatism which a liberal education and higher associations bring, Mr. Flintom is a much valued member of the licensed ranks, and he is destined to raise the licensed business in St. Louis to a high standard, both of efficiency and success.

The Jeffries-Johnson Pictures.

The Court's decision on the matter of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures is still withheld, and it is not expected that it will be given out for a week or 10 days from this writing (August 23).

But many Chicago people are seeing exhibitions of the pictures notwithstanding. This has been accomplished by giving presentations in Hughes theatre, on West Madison street and Harlem avenue, just outside the city limits, and in Forest Park, a summer resort, also outside the municipal bounds. The pictures have been running nearly a week in the Hughes theatre to capacity business, and no disturbance, nor even a semblance of it, has occurred. The first exhibition was given in Forest Park, Saturday evening, August 20, and the same good order and interest have ruled there.

Advertisements in all the Chicago dailies, except the Hearst papers, have been run regularly, announcing the showing of the pictures at the

"UNCONSCIOUS HEROISM"

A Gripping Pathe Drama

PATHE'S coming release, "Unconscious Heroism," belongs to that class of subjects that appeal to one's sympathies. It is supposed to picture an incident of the Franco-Prussian war when Paris was closely invested by the German army. Food of every description was pitifully scarce, more especially milk, for not only was the city cut off from the source of supply, but even the source had been ruthlessly eaten by the invading army.

In the incident pictured we are introduced to the family of a Parisian who has been called to the defense of the city. At home is his wife and babe, the latter slowly starving for the want of proper nourishment. The situation—the helpless child, agonized parents and the merciless demands of war—arouses conflicting emotions as one contemplates what seems to be a hopeless case. There seems to be no chance of relief. The city is closely invested; to venture outside the barricades is almost certain death; even then, what chance is there to get milk?

Yet there is one who dares: the young son of the family, a sturdy boy of possibly fourteen years; too young to do military duty, yet aroused by the stirring scenes and the danger all about him. He offers to make the attempt, but it is not without reluctance that the mother consents. Finally, the hero of this forlorn hope is seen making his way through the lines to a place where he hopes to find milk. Danger and death in many forms surround and threaten him. One follows his progress with breathless expectancy.

Eventually he reaches his goal and is about to obtain milk when he is arrested and haled before the commandant and charged with being a spy, whose punishment is death without trial or delay.

At this point it happens that the gruff German officer receives a letter from home telling him about his own children and his heart is warmed with the thoughts of them, so that, when the case of the little hero, condemned as a spy comes to his notice, and he learns the boy's story, he hesitates between strict duty and humanity and then, as the splendid heroism of the boy dawns upon him, the old general proclaims the bravery of his act to the assembled staff, and commands that the boy be saluted as the greatest hero of them all. He then orders that milk be supplied to him and that he be conducted safely through the lines, which order is obeyed.

Then comes the heartbreaking scene of the entire story; just as the boy is nearing the barricade he is fired upon by his friends, the defenders of the city, among whom is his father; and it is the father, not knowing who it is that is trying to approach the lines, who fires the shot that brings the boy to earth. Possessed with the thought that he must get the milk to the baby, the wounded boy manages to crawl closer until some of the defenders rush out and bring him in when his identity is established and it is found that his wound is not serious.

There is a bit of dramatic portrayal at this point that is very effective, but it is a happy relief when one knows that the baby's life has been saved, and that the little hero will not die from his wound. Altogether, this picture may be considered as one of the most satisfying and effective dramas issued recently by Pathe.

PICTURES BOOM IN TURKEY

Consul George Horton Claims Turks Like Pictures —Good Chance for Americans

Many have been the radical changes that have taken place in Turkey since the old Sultan was kicked off the throne, a couple of years ago, and now it can be said that the Ottoman Empire is becoming more like other civilized nations. Business of all kinds is beginning to boom and foreigners are finding it profitable to invest money in all sorts of business enterprises, with the assurance that the Turkish government will protect them.

Prior to the abdication of Abdul Hamid, the former Sultan, amusements were seldom allowed, as the Sultan was afraid his subjects would laugh so heartily they would think more of their own welfare than to the protection of his sacred body; again, the old Sultan didn't want his subjects to know what was going on in the world outside of Turkey.

Motion pictures were surely a detriment to the subjects of the man with many wives, and he, himself, was nearly scared to death when a motion picture exhibition was shown in his palace for his own benefit.

Within the past two years things have changed and the new Sultan, a man more modern, believes in having a good time and wants his subjects to have the same. Now, as Turkey is on a wave of prosperity, one of the sprays of that wave is the introduction of motion pictures to the public. To show how business is in the city of Saloniki, Consul George Horton furnishes the following information concerning the class of motion pictures now popular in European Turkey:

"There are four motion-picture shows in operation in Saloniki, and another is soon to be opened. About 3,500 people attend these shows nightly, paying an average admission fee of 2 piasters (8.8 cents). The films are obtained in Italy and France, and are mostly rented from the concerns that furnish them.

"The most popular films are those that tell a story in a series of scenes, either sentimental or humorous. Timely pictures of events that have attracted public attention also draw big crowds, as, for example, King Edward's funeral. At one time some American films were in use here, representing hunting scenes, battleships, etc., but these have entirely disappeared.

"Cinematograph shows are popular in the other big towns of this district, and it may be said that the business is booming. There are no regular theaters in any of these towns and motion picture shows have the amusement field practically to themselves. There is no reason why Americans should not get their share of this business if they would take the trouble to look after it."

KLEEMAN TO BUILD NEW THEATRE.

Otto Kleeman, a well known architect, of Portland, Ore., has just completed plans for the erection of a one-story concrete building, at 30 North Grand street, which will be used for an up-to-date motion picture theatre. The building, which will be 25x85 feet, has already been leased by a well known manager for a term of ten years.

The feature of placing a motion picture theatre on North Grand street, will have a tendency to draw the most fashionable business in the city.

A POEM IN PICTURES

An Exquisite Colored Series

By James S. McQuade

"POEMS IN PICTURES"—The very title appeals to both sentiment and imagination—is the euphonious alliteration employed to give a name to an exquisitely artistic film, soon to be released by George Kleine and bearing the Gaumont trademark.

I know that the title appealed to me in an impressive way and, furthermore that it led me to expect a great deal from the film. In this, I am glad to say, I was not disappointed, as the production of each of the five picture poems on the reel has been made with fine artistic judgment and a true poetic conception of the requirements, both of environment and of the characters.

I am convinced that the Gaumont producer of these pictures was fully aware of the fact that the moving picture has the power to express far more vividly the sentiment of poetry and to excite far more delightfully the pleasures of the intellect than has the masterpiece of a great painter. The latter has only pose and colors to take the place of "musical and moving words," whereas the moving picture has graceful, fascinating, life-action. The play of a smile on mouth and cheek and eye and its gradual effacement by the outward signs of some other emotion is clearly seen in the picture, while it is impossible in the work of the most famous painter. And the delicate coloring of the scenes in these pictures under examination succeeds in heightening the pleasure derived from viewing them.

The five picture poems of the series have, in order, "Love," "Bereavement," "Friendship," "Meeting and Parting" and "War" as the subjects. Three of these are pastoral, namely; the first, third and fourth. "Love" is in the form of an eclogue; "Friendship" is purely pastoral, while "Meeting and Parting" forms an idyll.

The reader will understand, of course, that a pastoral poem treats of scenes and incidents in rural, or country life, as apart from community, or city life, and that the characters in the earliest forms of this composition, were shepherds, due to the fact that the primitive occupation of the dwellers in the country was that of tending to flocks and herds of sheep and cattle. He will understand, too, that an eclogue is a choice, picked selection from pastoral poems and that an idyll is a short, highly wrought, descriptive pastoral poem, in which the episodes, or circumstances, are of rural simplicity and coloring. And so, with these few words of introduction, let us view the pictures.

The first, "Love," reveals a scene in which we have a glimpse of the portico of an ancient building in which a pretty maiden stands, in listening and expectant attitude, as she awaits her lover. The entrance is embowered amid a luxuriance of climbing vines and plants and, as her ear catches the sound of footfalls, she coyly hides herself in the vines until her lover passes. Then a merry laugh falls on his ear and, as he turns to look, he espies the fleeing figure of his sweetheart. In hot pursuit he fast gains on her and, as the scene changes, we find them on the parapet above, he with sacred tenderness in his approach and she in trustful maidenhood awaiting him. Then they seat themselves and he brings forth the pipe of Pan (for he is a shepherd) and, resting on his elbows, he pours forth his love in mellow notes. As he proceeds, he grows emboldened. He lays down the pipe and raises his face to hers. She inclines downwards to meet his caress, and he gently touches her ear with his lips, at the same time whispering into it tender words that are too sacred for even the winds to hear. How refreshingly pure and ideal it all is, and how fitting for a poem that is intended to portray the innocent loves of ardent and loyal youth and pure, trusting maidenhood!

The second picture, "Bereavement," is in great contrast with the first. It is an elegy on the death of a beloved husband and father. Mother and child are discovered standing beneath a great tree, besides a slab of marble which marks the resting place of their dead. The spot has been skillfully selected by the producer, for there is a bleakness about it that suggests bereavement. Soon they leave the scene and we again catch sight of them as they are led by another figure, Hope, to an angle in the massive stone wall that surrounds the graveyard. There the stranger offers the sorrowing wife an ancient lyre on which she sings the virtues of the departed, until her face glows with resignation and renewed hope. The producer has selected a higher ground, with a magnificent outlook on lake and sky for this last scene, as if to reflect the mental change that has come to the sorrowing ones.

Sweetly innocent and altogether delightful is the dainty picture of country life that next flits before us under the sub-title, "Friendship's Offering." On the steps leading up to the stately Corinthian columns of a building, hidden among the over-spreading branches of lofty trees, a little girl and her elder sister are seated. A beautiful maiden approaches, carrying in her arms a young lamb of snow-white fleece. The mother ewe follows close behind her. The lamb is presented to the little girl, who embraces it with all the warmth and affection of her young heart. The scene is an inspiring glimpse of sweet purity and affection.

GAUMONT SUBJECT "POEM IN PICTURES." "FRIENDSHIP."

An idyll on "Meeting and Parting" follows. The scenery of this picture can well be called idyllic, as it impressed me as being one of Earth's fairest spots. Sylvan shades and exotic colors, fair skies and vistas that carry one into the realms of dreamland, are all treasured up in this bit of film. And the lovers that appear in this home of the fairies are worthy of the setting. She, a bucolic maiden, confident in and proud of her charms, comes to the trys-

ting place. She sits on the wall by the roadside and, ever and anon, looks wistfully down into the hollow beneath her. She evidently expects him from that quarter. In an instant she is all aflame with joy at the nearness of the meeting, for she has caught sight of him. After a few moments the head of a handsome youth appears above the wall beside her, then his shoulders, and he has handed her a bunch of flowers which she kisses rapturously. He is evidently stealing this interview, for he looks nervously around as if to catch the sight of prying eyes. He speaks to her. As she turns to answer, he snatches a kiss with the swiftness of a humming bird's flight, and disappears. The maiden sits for a time in ecstacy, and a dissolving view of Cupid appears for a moment in the branches of the trees overhead.

The ode to "War" is a martial scene in which, at first, the news of conflict has brought consternation and fear to the men and women assembled before the entrance to their temple. The leader among them has spoken, and has not only failed to stir the martial ardor of his companions, but he himself has given up to despair. Soon a young woman of lofty bearing appears, accompanied by men at arms. She speaks to the cast-down men before her and, finding that speech fails to move them, she calls for a lyre. She then sings an ode to war, accompanying herself on the instrument, and slowly the martial spirit of the people is revived until, with clamor of shields and brandishing of swords, they rush off to meet the foe.

All these scenes are beautifully colored and the photography is excellent. The characters, too, are cleverly enacted. The effect produced by seeing the pictures for the first time is likely to be one of regret that they cannot at once be repeated. I believe in this case, that patrons will consider it a boon should exhibitors run the reel off for the second time, say after an appropriate song has been sung to afford a short interlude. The reel is only 400 feet in length, but it has so much of beauty, art and satisfying merit that one cannot grasp its full meaning and worth at one showing.

STAR THEATRE READY

Clinton's Best House Refitted Up for Winter Business—Many Novel Improvements

Work on the Star theatre, Clinton, Mass., has so far progressed under the direction of Contractor Andrew J. Robinson that Manager J. Henry Sorel expects to open September 1, at the latest.

By extending the balcony at the rear, the loss of seating capacity, caused by the enlargement of the stage, has been more than made up, and when the house is reopened, there will be seats for over 800 people instead of something over 700, as formerly.

The balcony has been extended toward the stage sufficiently to admit several additional rows of seats and it has been accomplished without putting in posts which would interfere with the view of the stage.

The biggest change has been made in the stage, which is large enough to accommodate the productions of the biggest companies. Not only has the stage been made wider, but several rows of seats at the front of the auditorium were sacrificed to increase its depth.

The state building inspectors have been frequently in Clinton examining the work being done and the building as it will be when reopened has the full approval of the state police.

A new rear exit has been provided and in case of fire, there will be doors which will give safe escape of every person in the theatre, whether in the audience, among the employes or among the actors.

An asbestos curtain provides for shutting off the flames between stage and auditorium and a trap door in the stage provides for the safe exit of all members of the company who may be behind the curtain, or in the dressing rooms.

BEN L. MORRIS IN NEW YORK

Secretary and Treasurer of Spragg Amusement Co. Claims Good Business in West Virginia

Ben L. Morris, secretary and treasurer of the Spragg Amusement Co., of Wheeling, W. Va., who is taking a couple of weeks' vacation in New York, and neighboring cities, was a visitor to The Film Index, last Monday morning. Mr. Morris and his wife have been making a tour of the latest motion picture theatres in the large northern towns with hopes of finding something new that will add to the attraction of his houses, The Court, Wheeling, W. Va., and The Olympic, Bellaire, Ohio.

The Court theatre, of Wheeling, is the largest house in the State of West Virginia, seating 1,600 persons. The house is equipped with every modern device intended to perfect the exhibition of motion pictures. Regarding the safety of their houses, the Spragg Amusement Co. has always made it a special study. The Olympic theatre, Bellaire, O., is another beautiful house, and has a seating capacity of 800. During both the winter and summer seasons this house has had all the business it could handle.

Mr. Morris is a strict believer of straight motion pictures and says there is nothing in vaudeville at motion picture prices. He also claims that the best pictures are the real thing and that he wants no vaudeville in his houses.

To give his patrons a good motion picture entertainment he runs six big reels of pictures at each performance.

Mr. and Mrs. Morris visited Atlantic City and Philadelphia on their return trip.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE FOR FITCHBURG.

The new owners of the American house property, among whom are Andrew and George A. Whitney of Fitchburg, Mass., are contemplating the opening of a motion picture house in the barn in the rear of the property. This is the barn that was formerly the American house stables, and until recently occupied by C. H. Hastings.

The plans are not completed as yet, and the scheme is not fully decided as a fact, but the idea is to remodel the barn into a theater building, with an entrance on the passageway running through from Day to Blossom streets.

The seating capacity of the house would be about 1,000, and it would be devoted entirely to motion pictures.

NEW ORPHEUM WINS POPULAR FAVOR.

Another thoroughly refreshing bill of approval vaudeville novelties enhanced by the latest of popular motion picture subjects made its initial appearance at the New Orpheum, New London, Conn., Aug. 16, since which time it has been viewed with great interest by thousands of New London's show going public who declare the bill to be among the best ever offered in the annals of local amusements. James J. Corbett, ex-champion pugilist of the world, in motion picture form, assisted by Miss Florence E. Turner, "the Vitagraph Girl," in a film production entitled "How Champions are Won and Lost," provides a vast amount of interest in its portrayal of gymnastic remarkabilities as displayed by this former "Monarch of the Roped Arena" who was never seen in better form than what he presents in this excellent picture. The other pictures to complete the program: "The Red Man's Way," (Indian drama); "Tommy Gets His Sister Married" (comedy); "The Highbinders" (dramatic); "The Almighty Dollar" (comedy).

"THE GREAT SECRET"

One of Roy Norton's Stories Done by Edison Players

IF you give the matter a second thought you will agree that, after having led a young and handsome secret service officer across the seas on what proved to be the wildest kind of a wild goose chase it was only fair that the guilty young lady should surrender her heart to him, since he could claim custody of her on no other grounds.

All this and much more happens in the pictured version of Roy Norton's story. "The Great Secret," done shipshape by the Edison players.

The handsome young woman of the picture has been sent to Paris by a New York modiste to spy upon the Paris fashion makers and learn the latest designs in corsets. In the course of her work she wanders out to the fortifications of the city and while there completes some of her sketches. In this she is observed by an alert sentinel who divines at once that she is sketching the plans of the fortress with the intention of selling them to the Germans, and so reports.

An investigation is at once ordered and, to make matters worse, a letter vaguely referring to "steel reinforcements" and signed by one of those frankfurter names, is found near the spot where the young woman was seen sketching. That bit of evidence clinches things and at once the French secret service machinery is set in motion.

Three officers are detailed to follow, to the ends of the earth if needs be, that young woman; to arrest her and to secure the plans, all of which they swear to do.

With the young woman, all unconscious of the turmoil she has stirred up, there is but one purpose in mind: to get those plans to her employers with all secrecy and speed. Concealing her identity under an assumed name she takes the first boat for New York with the three sleuths in full cry after her.

The picture now takes one aboard an ocean steamship, and there is no mistaking the fact that the pictures show a real ship. Here is a point that illustrates the growing popularity of motion pictures. The producers realizing that a "property" steamship such as could be erected in a studio, would never answer the purpose, so they set about to get the real thing. It just happened that one of the boats of the Anchor Line was at her dock and the obliging representative of the company obligingly turned it over to the Edison players with carte blanche to do any thing they liked so long as they didn't turn pirates. He had probably heard of "picture pirates" and wanted to be on the safe side.

Well, that arrangement gave the producers a whole steamship for their shipboard scenes and you're sure to like the result. For what happened during the voyage we must refer you to the picture, neither shall we tell you all about the happy but humorous finish; you may likewise find it in the picture, but we do say that it is clever comedy-drama, well acted and with good photography and scenic effects.

GRANITE INDUSTRY IN PICTURES

Lubin People Taking Pictures of Barre's Great Industry—Film to Be One of Industrial Value

Barre has been visited by the motion picture man, and in a few weeks, doubtless thousands of people, perhaps, in every corner of the country will have witnessed through the medium of the nickle theatres, the evolution of Barre granite from the quarry to finished monument loaded on flat-bottom cars to be shipped to almost every city in the United States.

J. J. Frawley, a representative of the Lubin Manufacturing Co., of Philadelphia, arrived in the city Aug. 17, and immediately set out for Graniteville, there to secure the first views for the film entitled, "The Granite Industry In Barre, Vermont." Mr. Frawley selected the E. L. Smith quarries as being suitable for showing the method of obtaining the stone in its crude state. He began by taking a panoramic view of the entire quarry, showing the granite as it is lifted out of the quarry hole in blocks. Views followed of the various mechanical devices which enter into the quarrying of the stone in operation, such as drills and tripods, derricks and electrically operated stone-splitters.

From the quarries, Mr. Frawley returned this morning to Barre, where he completed the films by establishing his machine in some of the granite sheds. Here the stone was shown as entering the shed in its crude state, coming out a finished monument and loaded on the car. In every instance, the workmen, even though they are sensible of being "took" continue with their labor, as though entirely oblivious to the fact shown throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is an interesting fact in connection with the making of the films, that there is no previous understanding between the operator and the laborer and that any attempt at "posing" is at once discouraged.

Mr. Frawley came to this city from Maine, where in Portland and Boothbay Harbor, he has been engaged in taking motion pictures of the lobster and sardine canning industry. Only recently he has returned from California and the Yellowstone National Park. He says that the film made in this city, is one of the most interesting he has yet secured, and believes that they will prove popular with the picture-loving public. He will go from Barre directly to Philadelphia to have the negatives developed and prints manufactured. They will be sent East on their completion, and there is a possibility of their being shown in this city sometime within the next four weeks.

The Lubin Co. is one of the oldest concerns of its kind in the country, and is a member of the combination of twelve companies controlling the entire film business of the world. Mr. Frawley thinks that he is one of the pioneers in his line, as he has operated motion-picture-taking machines for many years.

Although the views taken constitute a simple business proposition for the company, which sends out men all over the world to secure new crazy public, Barre's little contribution will be the means of presenting before thousands of people some idea of the magnitude of its granite industry. On the introductory plate of the film will be inscribed in large letters, "The Granite Industry in Barre, Vermont," (with the Vt. "spelled out").—Barre Times, Barre, Vt.

"LEAP FOR LIFE"

A Kalem Picture of Life in the Wilds of Canada

"LEAP for Life" is the title of a thrilling and strenuous picture soon to be released by the Kalem Company. The plot is laid in the wildest regions of Canada, inhabited only by trappers and Indians. The principal characters are a trapper and an Indian girl. The trapper gets in bad with the Indians on account of the death of one of them through an accident which circumstances would indicate to have been intent upon the part of the trapper. That is the interpretation put upon the affair by the Indians and they seek the life of the trapper in revenge.

He manages to escape through the assistance of the Indian girl, and out of gratitude, marries her.

The title of the picture is taken from the climaxic scene of the picture where the trapper, his chances of escape practically cut off, is compelled to leap across a dangerous chasm. It is the Indian girl that points out this way of escape and by it he succeeds in eluding his pursuers.

The chasm is a particularly dangerous rift in the rocks and the Kalem Company had some difficulty in inducing the actor who impersonated the trapper to undertake the leap. It was finally arranged that a life net, such as is used by the New York Fire Department to catch the people who jump from windows of burning buildings, should be spread across the chasm to catch the jumper when he made the leap for life in the event of a misstep. Fortunately there was no mishap, but the actor said that he would not care to do that particular stunt every day.

EUGENE MATHAUER BUYS ELITE THEATRE

William Hunt, of Woodland, Cal., has sold the Elite Theatre and will retire from the motion picture business in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Hunt came to Woodland something over two years ago. Their management of the Elite has been so successful and satisfactory that they have earned the good will and the plaudits of the theatre-going public, and their many friends will regret if the exigency of business makes it necessary for them to locate elsewhere. Mr. Hunt knows the show business in every detail and he has spared neither effort nor expense to please the public. His successor is Eugene Mathauer, who took possession of the property Aug. 20. Mr. and Mrs. Hunt will remain with him until he familiarizes himself with their methods of conducting the theatre.

STAR THEATRE, MARIETTA, O., OPENS.

The Star Theatre, of Marietta, O., formerly owned and operated by Mr. A. H. Wait, of Parkersburg, has been purchased by T. McCune, of the Theatorium, Front street. At present both places of amusement will be conducted in about the present manner, where the management will be pleased to meet their old and any new friends, and will endeavor to give them the very best of everything in the motion picture and vaudeville line. Mothers need not hesitate to allow their children, girls or boys, to attend either place, for they will be looked after and taken care of.

J. ROSENBAUM OF ALABAMA IN NEW YORK.

J. Rosenbaum, manager of the Amuse-U-Theatre and the Air-Dome, Gadsden, Ala., was a visitor to The Film Index last week. Mr. Rosenbaum claims that business during the hot weather had been good up until the rainy season came on when it quelled things in the out-of-door places.

Mr. Rosenbaum says the future outlook for the motion picture business in the south, is very bright and that the licensed picture houses are doing the best work in bringing the people to realize that the picture business in that section of the country is a permanent fixture.

While in New York, Mr. Rosenbaum spent much time in looking over the motion picture houses.

WHERE TO SEE THE NEW SOLAR SCREEN.

The Simpson Solar Screen is now making a big hit in the several places where it is installed in New York City. It is in practical operation at the Comet Theatre, Third Ave. between 12th and 13th St., where Mr. Levy, the proprietor, will be very pleased to show and explain the same to anyone desiring to see it. It has also been installed at Jos. Driscoll's Nicoland, 162d St. and Third Ave., Bronx. This gentleman will also be very pleased to show and describe this new and wonderful invention. Both of these places are amply illuminated. Managers who wish to investigate should visit one of these places and see the wonderful results obtained.

ADAMS EXPRESS ARROGANT

High Rates and Discourteous Treatment to Picture Men—Business Good

Writing from Denver, Colo., H. H. Buckwalter of the Denver Film Exchange says that there is a widespread protest in his territory against the treatment given exhibitors by the representatives and employees of the Adams Express Company. Here is what Mr. Buckwalter says:

"There is an immense sentiment gaining strength among the exhibitors of the West, to in some manner resist the arrogant treatment they receive from the Adams Express Company. It is, of course, true that all companies charge the same price, which I find is practically three times the amount charged for similar service by the companies east of Chicago. We value our shipments at $100 and some of our customers pay as high as $5 each way and get their programs three times a week. Several weeks ago we estimated that the average income to the express companies from our exchange was in excess of $2.50 per shipment in each direction.

"The exhibitors, of course, do not like to pay such high prices, but they feel that when they are also given discourteous and arrogant treatment by the officers as well as employees of the Adams Express Company, they are getting what they do not want. It is a condition which we examined very thoroughly several times, and I personally had several conversations with Mr. C. M. Day, the assistant superintendent of the Adams Express Company, as well as the general agent at Denver and they simply told me in somewhat strenuous language that they did not care for film shipments any way, and absolutely refused to make any effort to give our customers and exhibitors better treatment.

"Mr. Day's conversation was so positive that I thought best to have a stenographer on the telephone line at the time so there would be no possibility of his endeavoring to qualify his statements later. At any rate our experience was exactly what the exhibitors were getting and this was all we cared to learn. The exhibitors feel they must bring their wrongs to the attention of the general officers of the express companies. The effect will be very sudden on the Adams, but it will also compel the other companies to recognize the fact that the motion picture business at the present time is contributing more money to the express companies than almost any single business in the country. The main result of the crusade against the Adams will attract general attention to the fact that the volume of money paid for transportation is not only enormous but has originated within two or three years.

"This great development, of course, was responsible for the fact that the general officers of the companies did not recognize the volume of the business. The contemplated action will call their attention to the fact that in many cases the exhibitors are given very savage treatment and as the packages are carried as "valuables," the business must be given proper treatment.

"In connection with the Adams we feel it is impossible to expect any reasonable treatment at all in their present method of managing affairs and for that reason are making very few protests. By waiting for the final outcome we can deliver all with one blow. After considerable correspondence and personal conversation the exhibitors agreed that the Adams people were the easiest to place before the public with the confident feeling of giving astonishing results.

"In regard to general conditions of the picture business throughout our territory we were very fortunate this summer in having business kept up practically at the same level as in the preceding winter. So far as I know there was not a single failure in the picture line where the theatre was managed with any degree of ability.

"A number of exhibitors were got after by the Patents Company for showing unlicensed film, and possibly three-fourths of these went under within a couple of weeks. The others are simply holding on with the expectation of some day having their license renewed.

"The outlook for business beginning the first of September is absolutely cheerful. Nearly every exhibitor on our list is preparing to spend some money for renewing, painting and augmenting lighting on the outside, and this, of course, will greatly increase business and make higher profits for the show houses. The number of towns which will open their theatres for Sunday pictures after the first day of September will probably double and greatly increase each week on account of the very high quality of pictures being shown, and also the extremely careful censorship work, which has entirely eliminated any possibility of subjects that might be displeasing to any persons or sects."

BIOGRAPH CO.

"THE MODERN PRODIGAL."—Egotism is the most dangerous quality man can cultivate, for it makes us over-confident of our strength of purpose. Self-esteem is a fault that rarely goes unpunished. How few of us realize what weaklings we are without the guiding hand of the Great Master of all. In the opening of this Biograph subject, we find the callow youth as he points towards the city's spires, exclaiming to his dear old mother: "Mother, there in the big city is my sphere. There will I turn the world over." Off he goes cityward, ambitious and presumptuous and perhaps we may add reckless. Alas, the city's whirl is quite a change from the simple quiet life in the country, and the youth falls a victim to the snares that beset the unsophisticated. After a bitter experience, he returns, and in symbolism we show him in the raiment of sin—a convict's suit. Approaching his old home, he sees there in front of the door the old chair in which sat his mother on the day of his departure. What a difference; on that day there shone the sunshine of hope; to-day, the clouds of despair. As he regards himself in prison garb, he utters that penitential cry of the ancient prodigal, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Turning away, he staggers about exhausted to the pigsty, where he ravenously eats the husks upon which the swine feed. At this point we show the other side—the watchful father and his son. The father is the sheriff and has just received the notice of a convict's escape and a reward offered for his capture, the poor convict, meanwhile, being hounded from place to place by the pursuing guards. The sheriff's young son yields to temptation and is guilty of stealing apples and then lies about it. For this the father chastises him, so, in the spirit of rebellion, he goes swimming with his playmates. Here he is guilty of disobedience and is made to suffer. Going beyond his depth, he is carried by the swift running current into the rapids. The boy's drowning seems inevitable, but the cries of his companions are heard by the fugitive, who is hiding in the bushes by the side of the stream, and at the risk of his life and liberty he plunges into the seething torrent and drags the child to safety just as the father rushes up, having been informed of the boy's peril. Here is an awkward situation. He is torn by conflicting inclinations. As father of the rescued boy, he owes the fugitive an immeasurable debt of gratitude, but as sheriff it is his duty to arrest the convict. Here is where duty is unreasonable. However, there is no compromise where duty is concerned, and he is forced to perform it, odious though it be. At his home he leaves the prisoner in charge of his wife while he gets his carriage. The mother allowing maternal love to guide her feelings, feigns sleep that the prisoner may escape with a suit of civilian clothes, and return to his own despairing mother. As the poor unfortunate approaches his home, his mother, stretching forth her hands, exclaims: "My son was dead and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

"THE AFFAIR OF AN EGG."—Have you ever when you ordered "medium boiled in the shell," anticipated that these same hen products may hatch out a delightful romance? No? Well, here is an occasion of a near-romance—"near" because it was a trifle sidetracked. A romantic rustic maiden, while gathering the fruit of the nests for market, conceived the bright idea of sending a tender missive with her name and address on one of the eggs, relying upon Cupid delivering it to the affined one. But Cupid fell asleep at the switch, and the next we see of the egg is when it is served at a restaurant to a young man. Espying the writing thereon, he at once repairs to the address given. At this address he meets an old maid of fifty, fondling a cat. To his query she answers that the lady in question resides here and that she is the lady. No, this is not possible for the lady he asks for is the one whose name is written on the egg. Here is where the romance is scrambled, for she tells him that she wrote that when she was a girl many years ago. You see the poor maiden knew nothing of cold storage, where the egg had reposed all those years.

"MUGGSY BECOMES A HERO."—When we left Muggsy in our last subject he had just redeemed himself with his sweet heart, Mabel. Hence it is that when Mabel is requested by mamma to accompany her to the church meeting, she sends him a note asking him to meet her after service and he may walk home with her. Muggsy is there on time all right, but fate conspires again. The sisters Frost, two spinsters, on their way to church, were accosted by a couple of burly tramps who frightened the poor old ladies so that they were afraid to make the return trip unaccompanied, so the pastor asks that some of the men folks escort them. Poor Muggsy is booked, much to his chagrin, and when the trio reach the deserted part of the road the tramps again appear. Muggsy assures the ladies of his protection so to fear not. This declaration the tramps regard as a joke. Well the affair is on, and although Muggsy next appears in a torn, disheveled condition his opponents have to be carried bodily to the cooler—both knocked out. Mabel is justly proud of her Muggsy.

EDISON MFG. CO.

"FROM TYRANNY TO LIBERTY."—This latest of the special productions written and arranged for Mlle. Pilar Morin splendidly fulfils its purpose of providing her with a strongly dramatic story and with a series of events which calls for the widest range of her wonderful pantomimic art. It marks another stage of work on the art side of motion picture production and should prove not only popular but epoch making.

The scene is laid in Russia and the part played by Mlle. Morin is that of the wife of an editor whose revolutionary paper is under the ban of the tyrannical Russian police because of his fight for and advocacy of freedom.

The first scene is in the parlor of the editor's house and shows him in company with his wife and little daughter, the latter busily engaged in making a copy of a portrait of the father which hangs upon the wall. They are interrupted by a sound behind the secret panel in the wall and after apprehensive glances about, the husband presses a button which causes the panel to open. Through it appears a young printer. He comes from the inner room behind the panel where the little revolutionary paper is being gotten out and makes his appearance to ask about some detail of the publication. The child looking at her drawing indicates that it would be a good portrait of the young printer's face, and there is very evidently a strong resemblance between him and the editor, although the latter is a much taller and larger man.

The next scene is in the little printing office and it marks the appearance of a young girl, a revolutionist, who comes with the report that some of the secrets of the order or of the movement have leaked out, presumably through some one in the employ of this paper. Both the old printer and the young man of the previous scene are questioned and both deny having any hand in it. The matter is finally straightened out in a way, but the young printer's face is a study when he is left by himself.

The next scene shows him in his garret room evidently smarting under the accusation and determining upon revenge. He sits and writes a letter to the Prefect of Police giving information that the paper "Freedom" is being published at a certain house in the city and signing the letter only with the words "A Friend."

Then the story shifts back to the parlor of the editor again. He is going out and the parting with his wife and child makes it evident that there is an ever present fear that each one of these goings away may be the last. In this case their fears are well-grounded for he has hardly disappeared down the street before a young man bursts in with the information that the police are below, and he has hardly ceased speaking when the room is filled with the officers. They demand to know the whereabouts of the editor, information which the wife, and her bidding the child also, refuse to give. Then the police take the child away from the mother into an inner room and the leader of the officers proceeds to try and force her to give him the desired information. He seems inclined to make love to her and she wonders if this may not be a method of holding him off and eventually winning him from his purpose, but when she tries to escape to the room where the child is he roughly draws her back and flings her upon her knees before him. She pleads with him to release her and to bring the child back. And then the telephone rings. The man steps to the receiver and hears evidently the voice of the editor of whom they are in search. He commands her to come and call her husband to the house over the telephone. Of course, she refuses and he summons the other officers and showing her the knout, threatens her with a whipping. She refuses to obey.

The scene then shifts to the other end of the telphone line. The husband has been with his companions, members of the revolutionary party in a cabaret and has gone to the telephone to call up his wife for some information. He is evidently anxious and worried as he fails to get the response to his call.

Returning to the parlor we find the wife still pleading with the officer and his stern command to her to obey. When she still refuses, the whip is tried in the hope of forcing her by this cruel means. But she is loyal and refuses again and again. Finding his effort in this direction useless, the officer summons the men to bring in the child and tells the mother that the child shall suffer unless she calls her husband as directed. In this way he forces her to the telephone. And then, before she speaks, an idea comes to her that by feigning madness she may so delay the answer that her husband will understand that there is something wrong. So she suddenly turns upon the officer with wild eyes and picking up the child's doll fondles it in foolish madness and apparent delirium. The officer is non-plused for a moment and watches her, wondering if his efforts have really unbalanced her mentally. Again the scene shifts to the husband at the cabaret, to his anxiety and fear that there is something wrong as he cannot get the response from his wife as he frantically calls for the connection again and again.

Once more to the parlor, we find the officer watching the wife, and then as the child calls to her from the arms of the police her feigned madness suddenly leaves her and she turns to respond to the call. Instantly the officer understands the ruse and bringing the little one before her produces the terrible knot and informs her that unless she does call her husband the child will be whipped before her eyes. As the whip is raised her last resolution fades away. Rushing to the telephone she speaks the fatal words and falls in a faint upon the floor.

We see the husband receiving the message at the cabaret and starting for the house. But he is held by his faithful companions who realize his danger and that by going there he will only get himself into trouble and be unable to save the wife and child.

And then returning to the parlor we see the officer secreting his men about the room and the little mother reviving from her faint under the ministrations of the child. The door opens and the young printer appears. He snaps his fingers in her face and taunts the child with having drawn his portrait. As he does this an idea comes to the mind of the distracted mother and she sees that the resemblance the little one had noted may serve her purpose. She suddenly becomes solicitous of the young man's safety and as the police slowly appear from their hiding places she seems to plead with him to go. He laughs at her. And then seeing the police he would gladly make his escape, but it is too late. He protests that he is an humble printer and not the editor, but they point to the portrait on the wall which is so much like him, and deaf to his frantic pleading drag him away, leaving the wife and child alone to kneel in thankfulness to God.

Then there is a little scene showing how they cross the border. Their passports being examined by the officer at the frontier, which makes it evident that they are trying to leave the land of tyranny. The ordeal is safely past, though the officer seems suspicious. And then comes the dawn of freedom for the little party, our last glimpse of them being on board the ocean steamer sailing into New York harbor. Their eyes are fixed with longing and hope upon the shores they have so nearly reached. And then as the ship sails on there comes into view towering above them the majestic figure of the Statue of Liberty which expresses so much to every lover of freedom in the world. Like Israel Zangwill's play "The Melting Pot" this scene should make a powerful appeal to all who believe in and want to see America the real home of liberty, freedom and progress.

The whole picture is graphic, vital, dramatic and should make a telling appeal to audiences all over the world, adding substantially to the growing prestige of the Edison Company's product and the artists engaged in the presentation of the story.

"THE MAN WHO LEARNED."—It combines a strong and intensely interesting story with a clear showing of the contrasting methods of preparing and distributing milk in a great city. The so-called "Old Fashioned" way, now considered most unsanitary, starts the picture and also the story, and intertwined within its action is the development of the newer, better and healthier way of producing the milk supply which means so much to the health of hundreds of thousands of people to-day.

The first scene in a picturesque but not well-kept old-fashioned barnyard shows the milking of the cows in the old, careless way, the milkers with unwashed hands, and the cows just as they come from the pastures. Even the pails, beyond the casual scalding or washing out, are not in very perfect condition. A young man, the son-in-law of the proprietor of the old-fashioned dairy goods farms, protests against these conditions and against the poor pasturage which the cows have. His father-in-law rather objects to the criticism of methods which have the sanction of precedents. He has carried on the business for thirty years in the same old way and sees no sense in the new fangled ideas. The quarrel grows in the kitchen of the farm house when an untidy maid is using dirty towels to wipe the cans, and finally reaches a climax when the younger man points out the shipping of the milk in open wagons in the broiling sun without ice or protection. The father-in-law invites him to stop his criticism or leave the old farm. The young man accepts the latter invitation and taking his young wife and the baby, the latter the idol of the old man's heart, with him, he goes away. The old man is obstinate even in the face of this separation.

In town city conditions and living do not agree with the little grandson and the child is ill. The doctor is called in and rather shakes his head at the child's condition. Then we see the young mother on the street. She notices a sign which reads: "Old-Fashioned Dairy Goods." It recalls the old farm and the milk, and she thinks that possibly some would be good for the sick baby. She gets a pail from the storekeeper and he ladles it out from the open can some of the milk which she takes back to the little apartment. It doesn't seem any too clean being ladled out in this way so she strains it and then feeling sure that it is all right, gives it to the child.

And the next scene shows us that the little one's condition is critical. The doctor asking what food has been given the child makes a brief test and discovers that the milk is lacking in quality and not sanitary and is probably responsible for the child's serious condition.

News of the child's illness then reaches the farm and the old man fairly beside himself with anxiety forgets his quarrel and packing up his things and hurries off to the city. Arriving there he pushes past the anxious father, kisses the mother and bends over the bed of the little grandson. Then he demands of the doctor the cause of the child's illness. The doctor tells him it is the milk. The grandfather turns angrily upon the father with a demand to know why such milk was given the child. Of course, there is only one answer—the milk came from the old man's farm and is a result of his unsanitary methods. The child's illness is directly traceable to his own obstinacy and carelessness and his unwillingness to learn modern ways. And then at the hour of the crisis when the child must either live or pass away, the old man realizes his fault and kneels in thankfulness when the child's life is finally spared. He returns to the old farm and a little later the convalescent baby gets a characteristic note from "grandpa," inviting him to come and bring his father and mother with him to see some new things at the farm. The father refuses to go, but the mother takes the baby, and we next see them back in the old kitchen which is now clean and kept by a tidy maid, the slovenly one having transformed her self. Then follow successive scenes about the farm and the dairy in which the cows have beautiful new pastures of picturesque value, rich in tall grass and running brooks. And in the dairy the milking is all done by whitesuited men whose hands have been carefully inspected, and the cows are sprayed, cleaned with vacuum cleaner, brushed and washed before the milking. The milk is never handled at all, but after being poured into the cans is sent on a trolley across to the strainer. From there it goes to the cooling machine and is bottled by another ingenious machine which puts the caps on without the touch of a human hand. Even the bottles are cleaned and sterilized by machinery. Everything is white and clean and sanitary and as the mother writes, even the little grandson approves of the changes.

The picture ends with the coming of the young man, the baby's father, and with his recognition that the old man's apology has taken the best possible form. A reunited family brings the story to a close and shows us a healthy baby and a happy outcome of all the trials and troubles.

The story is one of the best combinations of interest, the industrial side not being slighted at all, but rather accentuated by scenes of the story and the strong personalities which it introduces. The contrasting dairy methods are thoroughly and perfectly shown. The picture should prove far more interesting than most so-called industrials and more attractive than the majority of plain story films. We are indebted to the New York Milk Committee for its hearty co-operation in the production of the film.

"THE MILLIONAIRE AND THE RANCH GIRL."—Nellie Blair and her father, an invalid, are in hard circumstances, due to the long illness of the latter. They have mortgaged their ranch and the mortgage is held by a young millionaire in a distant city, a local agent, however, representing him. Howell, the agent, an unscrupulous and crafty schemer, loves Nellie, and having proposed to her unsuccessfully, finally resolves to make use of the mortgage which he, by law, may foreclose at any time.

Howell calls on the old man and insists on being paid. Blair deplores his lack of funds and begs for more time. Howell leaves, finally, with a half-way promise to let the matter stand for a few days, and on his way back to town encounters Nellie. He again presses his suit, but she scorns him, and when he turns on her with blazing eyes, showing her the mortgage and threatening her with the loss of her home, she brands him a coward and hurries away sobbing.

Some days later Milton Rodd, the young millionaire, in his office in the city, receives word from Howell explaining in highly exaggerated terms the flat refusal of Blair to pay the mortgage. Rodd immediately writes Howell and in the body of the letter orders him to collect the mortgage, but adds a significant postscript to the effect: "But if they are financially unable to meet this, give them all the time they desire."

This letter plays an important part in Howell's campaign for the girl's hand, and presents a strong situation in the story. The crafty agent tears off the postscript and presents to Blair merely the body of the letter, which orders the agent to evict Blair and his daughter upon refusal to pay.

The next day the old man and his daughter are evicted, and are forced to take up their abode in a tent. Howell again comes on the scene with his promises and temptations, but Nellie orders him away.

Milton Rodd at this time suffers a breakdown from overwork, and is advised by his physician to go to the country for a rest. Having heard of the eviction of the Blairs, he resolves to make the ranch house his home during his vacation, and a few days later he is comfortably established on the premises. By a lucky accident Nellie and her father, out for a walk, come into the yard for a drink of water, and meet Rodd. Nellie refuses to speak to him, and Rodd learns their identity from one of his ranch hands.

Scenting trouble, and suspecting that something is not quite right, Rodd follows Nellie and her father to their tent, and though she again refuses to talk, he obtains sufficient information to be convinced that Howell was not on the square.

He learns the whole wicked scheme when he forces Howell to produce his letter and also the detached postscript. With this as proof of his own innocence, he forces Howell to accompany him to the Blair's temporary abode and makes him confess to his evil scheming.

When Howell leaves the girl expresses her gratefulness, and it is only too evident that a love affair is well started between them.

"WHO'S WHO."—The Wilamette high school boys, much against the wishes of their parents, have organized an athletic association and have fixed up a gymnasium. All they wish now is some capable instructor in the art of fisticuffs. They see the advertisement of a former pugilist, "Spider" O'Brien, who desires such a position, and write him a letter asking him to come down and look them over.

Now, in the little village aforementioned there is nothing so degrading as prize fighting (perhaps the Jeffries-Johnson "go" has had something to do with it), and it is planned by the boys to make the affair one of most careful secrecy. For that reason, and much to the mystery of "Spider," the request is made that he come disguised as a man of the cloth.

At the same time this conspiracy has been brewing the father of the ringleader, who is a deacon in the church, has been negotiating with the Rev. S. O. Binns, lately chosen pastor of their congregation, for his attendance at a reception to be given him at the home of Deacon Spratt the next day.

The Rev. Binns writes an acceptance to the deacon's invitation, and a similar telegraphic message from "Spider" O'Brien is received by the boys.

At the station next day, the boys, who have arrived ahead of the deacon, capture the minister, and before he has time to explain, hustle him to the gymnasium.

Likewise, "Spider" O'Brien is mistaken for the preacher, and is hustled off to attend the pink tea affair at the deacon's home.

The scenes which follow, flashing alternately from the gymnasium to the deacon's parlor, are uproariously funny. "Spider," who can't get next to the mistake, sips tea from his saucer and waits for something to happen. Rev. S. O. Binns, in the gymnasium is laughed at when he stoutly denies being a pugilist, and is forced to put on the gloves and box with the boys. "Spider" finally decides to start something, and begins showing the shocked gathering some good uppercuts and body punches. He finally is informed that he is supposed to be the Rev. S. O. Binns. Then he seizes his hat and "beats it."

He meets the parson on the street, and after exchanging directions to the right destinations, they go off to keep their belated appointments. "Spider" is welcomed by the boys and a really warm bout is in progress when there is a rattling at the door knob, and the deacon, followed by the reception party, enter. The boys are sent home with warnings as to what will follow, while poor "Spider" is soundly lectured by an old maid. Then, with indignant glances, the party sweeps out, and "Spider" is left in the gymnasium alone.

"YOU STOLE MY PURSE."—Jack Gordon is seated on a park bench when our story opens, enjoying his paper, when a spoony couple come up the walk and sit down beside him. Jack squeezes over to make room for the couple and buries himself in his paper. The young lady gives her undersized escort her purse to hold, and the young fellow, intending to thrust it into his pocket, slips it into Jack's pocket instead.

Jack is unaware of the purse until he gets home, takes off his coat and settles down comfortably to enjoy a cigar. His wife finds the purse, and an awful storm breaks. Mother-in-law comes on the scene, finds her daughter in tears, and listens to the explanations. Jack is accused of being untrue to his wife, despite his emphatic denials to the contrary. Yet he is unable to explain how he obtained the purse, and after his mother-in-law has searched the purse and found the name of the owner, she rushes out of the house, intending to vent her wrath on the hussy who had been plying her wiles upon her susceptible son-in-law.

In the meantime the young people in the park have left and started for the girl's home, when the loss of the purse is discovered. The young man is surprised and they go back to the bench to search for it. Alas, it is not to be found there, and the young lady is about to denounce her beau as a careless wretch when mother-in-law comes frantically on the scene.

The girl recognizes her purse and stops mother, and a tussle is in progress when two policemen dash on the scene and separate the clawing, fighting women.

After great difficulty mother is dragged to the station, and after more trouble is lodged in a cell.

Finally, however, she is subdued and is brought forth to be given bail by her son, who has been notified of the arrest.

The young lady receives her purse, and mother is given her liberty after she promises never to have to be arrested again.

"THE SHEPHERD AND THE MAID."—A party of tourists go mountaineering one morning, and a lady of their number becomes separated from the others and falls down a cliff, without, however, any serious injury. Her cries are heard by a mountain shepherd, who, guided by the sound of her voice, finds her. He informs her father, and takes the girl back to the house at which he lives. The shepherd receives their thanks, but he has conceived a great liking for the young lady which is returned. The separation proves unhappy for both. The last scene is forty years afterwards. They have not forgotten their parting and the vision of their one kiss rises before their eyes.

"UNREQUITED LOVE."—Introducing a family party in which the two vivacious and pretty sisters prove of the greatest interest to us. We watch an interesting flirtation between the sisters and a youth, who is evidently a close friend of the family. Here he unfolds his mind to one of the maidens, asking her to intercede with her sister in his behalf. This she does, in spite of her own great love for him.

The parents are visited with this query and express their pleasure at the outcome of the pleasant courtship. Staged magnificently and lavishly costumed, this scene proved delightfully entertaining. The pathetic side of the drama is now introduced. The acting of the less fortunate sister in this portion is a wonder of dignified pantomime. The disappointed maiden has gradually declined until she has become an invalid. The sister and her husband both exhibit the greatest kindness to her at all times. While the rest of the family are happily engaged in a day at the Flower Carnival the invalid girl passes away. To add to the pathos, the happy party on their return, thinking she is asleep, shower their friend with flowers.

"CALINO TAKES NEW LODGINGS, OR REPAIRING THE FLAT."—He moves.—With all the awkwardness of the usual crowd of teamsters and baggage smashers. A rather quiet prelude to the numerous "near tragedy" events which are to follow. Offering the comedian a remarkable opportunity to display his utter inability to cope with the easiest situations. The aid of all neighbors is enlisted more to radical confusion than to profit or aid. The manouevers of this group are so erratic that any audience will be continually surprised as well as amused. The film, which is a satire on the flimsy flat buildings of Paris, finally closes by Calino being easily dragged through the ceiling by irate neighbors, who object to his driving nails up through their floor in his efforts to hang a chandelier.

"BUYING A BEAR."—A happy party of holiday seekers get into a street brawl with a flower seller and consequently are taken in charge and trotted off to the police station. Owing to the absence of the chief inspector release is refused them under any pretext.

Shortly afterwards, some travelling showmen accompanied by a bear, are brought in for the inspection of their papers. On learning the nature of the newcomers' calling, the friends offer a good sum for the exchange of costumes in order to get out of their predicament. The papers being found in order, they are duly set free, accompanied by the bear.

All would have gone well if the bear had behaved, but finding himself in strange hands he starts having high jinks of his own. Finally, the police once again interfere, and finding that the bear has imbibed rather too freely, procure a barrow on which he is taken without friends to the station.

On full explanation, the bear is restored to his original owners, who, after being severely rebuked, are set at liberty.

"WON IN THE FIFTH."—He has fought his last fight and the prize ring will know the old pugilist no more. Knocked out by an organic disease, he is in a bad way, not only physically, but financially. He has an interesting daughter, a bright boy, and a good wife who are well thought of by the people of the neighborhod in which they live, among whom is a young minister.

The doctor who attends the old boxer sees that nothing but a complete change to some warmer climate will benefit the patient, and also recognizes that under the circumstances the change would be impossible unless some one comes to his assistance with the necessary money to defray the expense. The physician writes a note to the young clergyman telling him his diagnosis of the case and his conclusions.

The young divine hastens to see the sick man. On his way he passes a theatre in front of which there is this announcement: "$500 will be given to any middleweight who will meet the middleweight champion, Denny Dooley, and last five rounds; bout immediately after regular performance to-night." An idea somes to the minister, who has been a noted college athlete: If the worst comes to the worst, he will meet the champion and try to win the five hundred dollars and give them to the old pugilist to defray the expenses of sending him away for treatment to some health resort.

Changing his general appearance, laying aside the evidences of his calling, the young man attends the show that evening and impatiently awaits the appearance of Denny Dooley. The manager announces the champion middleweight and makes the five hundred dollar offer to anyone who will meet him and last five rounds. The minister steps on the stage and says he would like to try. The contest begins and the first round is an even break. Round after round is fought; in the third the minister gets warmed up, shows his class, and in the fifth round gets one over on the jaw of his opponent, knocking him out, winning the bout and the five hundred dollars. The next day he goes to the sick man's home, presents him with the money, thus giving his friend a chance for health and life and gaining the gratitude of the family as well as the hand and heart of the daughter.

"THE STRONGER SEX."—Laura Jackson, left an orphan, comes to the city to obtain employment, but finds employers unsympathetic, and discovers that it is almost impossible for a woman to make a living wage. Her funds are getting low when a contrast between the two bulletins in front of an employment agency impresses her. A male stenographer is offered fifteen dollars and a girl but three. With her small savings she purchases a complete outfit, and as her own brother, sets forth to obtain employment. Her trim appearance is in her favor, and she not only quickly obtains employment, but she wins the love of the girl stenographer, and is forced to disclose her secret to the girl. The bookkeeper is jealous of the stenographer's love for the new clerk, and seeks to obtain his dismissal by concealing some bills in the boy's pocket and reporting his loss. "THE MAN WHO DIED."—James Jardine is wealthy but he would willingly give his money to regain his health, though the best surgeons have pronounced his paralysis incurable. William Jardine, his graceless brother, comes as a self-invited visitor and usurps to himself the rights of the household, and even comes to regard James as an intruder. He is rather well pleased when it is believed that the helpless man has rolled into the lake and takes complete possession of his legacy. But James Jardine was not drowned. As he sat in his wheel chair a couple of automobilists, with alcoholic kindliness, decided to give the invalid a ride, and in raising him to put him into the car they knocked the chair into the lake. Soon they tired of their company and unceremoniously dumped him beside the road, where he is found by Dr. Griggs. Griggs tells Jardine that his paralysis is curable, and while the treatment is being given Jardine gives no hint to his brother. Love comes with health and Alice Griggs goes with him as his bride when he returns home. He is not a welcome visitor when he arrives, for Bill is riotously enjoying himself with some of his boon companions, and does not relish being turned out of the house with but a small allowance, but James is mindful of the many insults and annoyances and the time of reckoning has come.

PATHE FRERES.

"MEMENTO OF THE PAST."—The apple of her father's eye, the brightest thing her mother knows, little Violet's sudden illness and death are a shock to her parents that created sad havoc in their lives. Their love and tenderness for their child was their sheet anchor, and without her the sweetness of life is changed into bitterness and gall. He drowns his misery in drink while she slaves with her needle. Weary of the life, the woman at length decides to leave her husband. She is packing up a few articles of clothing when the man enters with a sneer on his lips and a jeer in his voice to mock at her. He makes no attempt to stay her until the sight of a toy, the doll which Violet had clasped in her arms as she lay dying, gives birth to another violent quarrel. Both claim this last memento of their child, and both clutch desperately at it, hate in their two faces drawn close together in the struggle, cruel malice and resentment betokened in their whole attitude—a pitiful sight indeed until the tension is suddenly and spontaneously broken by a sob, as the memory of their child touches some forgotten spring in the minds of both, making the hard faces to relax, the clutching fingers to straighten, and the lines of the mouth to soften, as husband and wife, with a sudden cry for mutual sympathy and forbearance, cling to each other in a close embrace.

"KIDS WILL BE KIDS."—Dick and Lucy are cautioned by their parents, who are about to go out, to do their lessons and be good children. The two youngsters promise and open their books before them. The door, however, has scarcely shut, before they have commenced a series of somersaults, jumps and other startling acrobatic feats, which continue uninterruptedly until a ring is heard at the door. The parents have returned and when they enter the room they find the children with their heads buried in their books, hard at work at their studies.

"ADVERTISING FOR A WIFE."—Louis Conroy thought when he inherited his father's comfortable fortune and took a little apartment of his own, that he had everything that he could desire. But he was soon disillusioned, and found that he needed a wife to complete his happiness. Louis was a man of action, and the idea no sooner occurred to him, than he had written and taken to the local newspaper for insertion an ad stating that applicants for the position of a wife to a handsome, rich young man should apply the following day. True, on his way home it caused him to ponder when he saw a family of six boys, but they passed on their way quickly. Next day Jerome Avenue was astir. All sorts and kinds of women were making for the Conroy apartment. Louis got a glimpse of them from the window, that was enough for him, and after a moment's thought he discovered a way to get rid of the surging mass of applicants. He burnt some cork and colored his hands and face. Entering his parlor he asked for the first to be shown in. She did not at first see his face, but when she did, what an uproar there was. She rushed out and told the mob waiting outside that it was a colored man that had advertised; and the way they left that house would have done credit to a rat pursued by a terrier. One colored woman remained, however, and she was now shown in and was delighted to find his visage to be jet black. Falling on him and kissing him, she noticed that white appeared where she kissed him, and his trickery being thus exposed she left after administering a few blows of no gentle character. Mary the maid, ascertaining that he had been unable to select a wife, came to the conclusion that it was up to her, so, disguising herself in a cloak and heavy veil, she entered the parlor. Louis was at once attracted by her pretty figure, and when she fetched his pipe and lit a match for him, he came to the conclusion that he had obtained the right girl. When he discovered who she was, it did not alter his opinion, and he gave her the ring he had purchased in anticipation of getting engaged to someone that day.

"SAVED FROM RUIN."—John Mortimer is staying with his wife, Marian, and her sister Beatrice at Monte Carlo, and is fast ruining himself at the gambling tables. Claud Charlton is a great admirer of Marian, and one day, seeing her husband lose his fortune at the Casino, he despatches a note to her that if she will meet him he will advance her husband sufficient to set him on his feet. Beatrice, who has noticed Claud's attitude towards her sister, is suspicious when the note comes by messenger, and opens it. Heartbroken at learning of her brother-in-law's misfortune, she decides to keep the appointment herself. At the appointed time, heavily veiled, she meets Claud, but a gust of wind allows her partially concealed face to be seen, and Claud, greatly surprised, hears the whole story. He is generous hearted enough to reassure the trembling girl, and advances Mortimer the money for the sake of one whom he says he has found to be an angel in disguise and whom he decides to marry.

"MAGGIE HOOLIHAN GETS A JOB."—Maggie Hoolihan, fresh landed from Ellis Island, having just come over from one of the little villages in the remote west of Ireland, was anxious to immediately commence to make her fortune, so she applied at Mr. Jinks' house in Jersey City for a job as maid. Having a very strong recommendation from the priest of her native village, she was soon installed in this position. While the family are out she, incidentally brushes Jinks' coat with the carpet sweeper and drops it in the street. This attracts the attention of Officer Clancy, who, looking up, sees her fresh rosy cheeks. It does not take him long to make up his mind to go in, and the two soon become fast friends, and Maggie invites him to stay to supper. This was her undoing, for the Jinks family returns, find Clancy and Maggie sitting in the parlor eating the succulent meal that they had returned to partake of, and it did not take but a few moments for Jinks to throw

Finally Clancy decides to marry her and to give her a permanent job for life, and he accordingly takes her to his home and introduces her to his children, only ten in all not counting the dog. Here she settles down and looking after this family keeps her busy, while she leaves it to Clancy to get together the fortune she hoped to make.

"JEAN AND THE CALICO DOLL."—This story begins differently from most stories. It starts with a business transaction during which a large sum of money is exchanged between Mr. Doyle and another man, who pays the money to Mr. Doyle. During the transaction Mr. Doyle's son is sitting at the window and his little daughter is playing with her collie dog, "Jean," on the floor. The father sees the man to the front door, leaving his son and daughter in the room where he left the money on the table.

The son leaves the room, and the little girl, who is now alone in the room, sees the money, and thinking it is only paper, takes it out in the garden and puts is in the little cradle with her calico doll and cuts one or two of the bank notes into dolls. After the child has gone out the father returns to the room and cannot find the money. He calls the wife; she knows nothing about it, and the father accuses the son of stealing it. The son is indignant, and leaves home. He has hardly left the house when the little girl comes in with the money and gives it to her mother and shows her the pretty paper doll she has made out of one of the bills. The dog follows with another bunch of money which the child has dropped. The mother calls her husband, and the child explains that she thought the money just paper and she is grieved to hear her brother, whom she dearly loves, has been accused of stealing and has left home.

She starts out with her calico doll to find her brother, her collie dog following after her. She wanders through the fields and woods, where she falls trying to reach a flower, down a steep embankment onto some rocks, spraining her ankle, and lying unconscious. The faithful dog tries to rouse her, and, finding it impossible, runs home to get the child's parents to understand him in his efforts to report the child's accident. He rushes back to the child, carries her calico doll to the parents and makes them realize that the child is missing and in danger.

While worrying over the loss of their son, here is another loss of their daughter. The son is brought back home by his attachment for his little sister and mother, and when he learns of the loss of his sister and sees "Jean" with her calico doll, he follows him to the place of her accident and brings her safely home. The father apologizes to his son, who resists. His little sister tells him to forgive and forget. Father and son are reunited; the wife and mother is made happy by the return of her children, and the serenity of the whole family are more firmly cemented in their gratitude, for which "Jean" comes in for his share.

"A LIFE FOR A LIFE."—There are some conditions of human existence that we are all anxious to escape, and notwithstanding our natural antipathy for such conditions, we always pity anyone who is a victim of environments or a predisposition towards them. Pity is akin to sympathy, and we cannot help feeling a desire to help anyone to rise above them if we recognize the slight ray of hope for their redemption.

There is nothing very attractive about a convict or a rat, but when we see the poor unfortunate in his lonely cell playing fondly with his pet rat while the world shuns him we are convinced that his love for even a dumb creature is a strong indication of a redeeming quality in his nature; at once he has our sympathy and attention, and when the prison keeper bursts into the convict's cell, seizes the rat and kills it we find ourselves urging the prisoner on when he strangles the keeper for robbing him of his only companion and comfort.

The convicted man is placed in solitary confinement. A visiting clergyman, with the prison superintendent, his wife and little girl, making a tour of the cells go into the cell and the superintendent's child and the clergyman speak kindly to the poor fellow, his heart is moved and the darkness of his soul is dispelled by the touch of love and kindness, and we cry when the spark of hope we saw at the beginning is still alive and is revived in the man.

The last scene of this remarkable story shows that our sympathies were not misplaced, and the trust imposed and kindness extended to the convict by the superintendent and by his family were well bestowed when, regardless of self, he rushes into the blazing home and rescues the superintendent's child from the flames, willing to lay down his life that she might live. In this deed of heroism and gratitude our higher emotions respond to the better part of our natures and we are not ashamed of the pearls of feeling which irresistibly glisten in our eyes when at the end the poor fellow smilingly greets the superintendent and his child as he lies upon his bed of pain in the hospital ward.

Pictures of this kind are strong in the encouragement of the humane and philanthropic elements of our nature; they tend to develop our faith in the betterment of mankind. They are logical and natural, and for that reason they appeal to greatest good in the greatest number.

"THE WRONG BOX."—Mistakes are common, especially when a young man is in love like the one in this story. He and his girl are invited to a reception and dance. In accord with the proper caper, he buys some cut flowers for her and orders them sent to his house. Then goes to a gents' furnishing store and buys himself a suit of pajamas, taking them home with him in a box.

He places the box on a chair, and when the box of cut flowers was sent from the florist's they were placed on another chair. Taking his coat off he throws it on the chair holding the box of flowers, entirely covering the box. He calls a messenger boy and tells him to take the flowers to the young lady's home. The boy only seeing one box, naturally picks up the one in sight, containing the pajamas, and delivers them to the young lady with the young man's note saying he hopes she will wear them for his sake.

When the adored one opens the box and recognizes its contents you can readily see the young man's finish. She goes to the reception without him, accepting the escort of another young man, and refuses to notice or listen to the apologies of the young fellow who sent the wrong box. He cannot understand her treatment of him at all, and she leads him a merry dance, which makes him look and feel like a monkey.

He goes home discouraged, puts on his dressing gown, picks up his business coat from the chair to get a cigarette from the pocket and discovers the box of flowers. As soon as possible he goes to his girl's home with the box of flowers, explains his mistake, how it happened, similarity of boxes, etc. All is forgiven and again cupid is tranquilly poised on the wings of love, while two arrow-pierced hearts beat in rythmis harmony.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

"THE EMIGRANT."—The Emigrant will be offered with the hope and the confidence that it will serve as another strong "friend maker" for the Diamond S. trade mark. In this picture Selig has gone to the steerage of a trans-Atlantic liner to take up the first threads of his story. He follows a party of emigrants to Chicago where they are being unloaded from a railroad train and sent to their respective destinations. One of their number wearing an identification card in his hat which bears the information that he is "L. Jacoby, going to Omaha, Neb.," becomes confused and is lost in the crowd.

Realizing that he is alone—a stranger in a strange land, and being unable to make himself understood by word of mouth, he wanders through the city until he chances to meet a stranger who will stop long enough to read his card and put him on his way. The stranger is kind. The traveler gives him his last few dollars to pay for transportation to Omaha. He is taken to an overhead railway and shoved abroad the train. He turns to thank his benefactor and finds himself alone, speeding over the city in an "L" train—his new-found friend and his money gone. We meet him again at the "L" terminus. Heart sick and weary he takes up his aimless wandering, he is attacked and injured by a gang of street hoodlums when two good Samaritans, in the persons of a big hearted Irish woman and her son take him, wounded and bleeding, into their home, where they nurse him back to health and give him his first insight into true Americanism.

He has become a good and respected citizen of our United States, adversity has set a heavy hand upon his Irish benefactress and her son. He repays them in a way that will make you glad.

"THE ROAD TO RICHMOND."—No period in our glorious American history is so endowed with the noble reminiscences of manhood as those memorable days when brother fought brother and shed their life's blood for the cause their conscience told was right. The firing of Fort Sumter was the signal that made possible the most fearful war the world has ever known. A half century has plodded by and yet embers of that great struggle still smoulders in the hearts of every brave American, and has served to perpetuate the memory and immortalize those grand old generals—Lee, Grant, Sheridan, Mead, Longstreet, Sherman, Jackson and others while the great events of the stirring days had passed into history. It remained for the redoubtable "Selig" to put in pictures at an enormous expense this wonderful panorama of human sacrifice, and accordingly chose as his title "The Road to Richmond," with Jennie Carrol, sister of Lieut. Carrol, as his heroine. The scenes are all in old Virginia and covering that period from 1860 to 1865. Pretty Jennie Carrol falls in love with her brother's comrade, when her brother brings him home on furlough. They are both officers in Uncle Sam's army prior to the war. When that dread event happens, separation ensues and the meeting of the comrades in battle. The final reunion between the northern soldier and his southern sweetheart form the story interest of this latest Selig war picture. Old in theme truly, but told as "Selig" tells them, and it holds the interest from the first. It's a big production, a clear story and will please both Northerner and Southerner as the war scenes are only introduced when they have a natural bearing on the story the picture tells. No bigger and certainly no better war picture has ever been produced.

KALEM CO.

"WHITE MAN'S MONEY, THE RED MAN'S CURSE."—Still another Canadian Indian story is announced by the Kalem Company. The title, "White Man's Money, the Red Man's Curse," contains the theme of the plot. The story is supposed to be located with an Indian tribe so situated in reference to the whites that they have become more or less effected by the white man's ways.

Two young bucks have made the usual Indian offers for the daughter of the chief, but the chief is not influenced by horses and robes, and wants his daughter paid for in white man's money. The two Indian suitors naturally start out to get it. Their efforts result in the death of one and the jailing of the other.

The story is a study of the influence of the whites upon the redskins, and is marked by the same careful attention to details that has characterized recent Indian pictures made by the Kalem Company.

"A GAME WITH FAME."—This is the title of an emotional drama which is being announced by the Kalem Company for Aug. 31. It is the story of a young woman living in a country town who is so ambitious for a literary career that she forsakes her lover and her family and goes to the city to take a position on a magazine. Her work catches on immediately and she quickly arises to a position of considerable importance in the Bohemian life of the big city. In the excitement of her successful career she utterly forgets the folks she left at home. Even her lover is overlooked in the excitement of the game, and she becomes betrothed to a man of the world who is interested in her for her position rather than her personality. In the meantime the girl's eyes have been giving out and she becomes practically blind. New York specialists give up her case as hopeless and in her distress all of her Bohemian friends desert her, even her new found fiancee. She is then compelled to return to the country home expecting that her own people will have no love left for her; but she meets with open arms instead of rebuffs, and very quickly learns that her original loves were the best after all.

The story is worked out in a charming manner by the Kalem players, and will doubtless prove a strong feature of the week's program.

TWO NEW THEATRES FOR DUNKIRK

Rapid Work on Both Empire and Star—Both Houses to Run Pictures

J. L Drohen's new theatre at the southwest corner of Washington avenue, and East Third street, Dunkirk, N. Y., now is under roof and is being rushed to completion as rapidly as possible. The completion of this and the new Empire Theatre, a short distance east on East Third street assures the people of Dunkirk of two more good amusement places for the coming season.

The Drohen theatre, it is expected will be completed by the middle of October. It will be equipped with all the most up-to-date theatrical apparatus and will have a capacity for seating approximately 2,000 people. There will be a balcony and a gallery and in addition a number of boxes

Mr. Drohen expects to present to the patrons of his theatre not only high class vaudeville and motion pictures, but will book regular theatrical attractions.

The new Empire theatre, which will be managed by Charles and Earl Brooks, though more modest in dimensions, will be equally first class in every particular. This theatre is approaching completion and it is expected the work of decorating the interior will be commenced before the week is ended.

This theatre will have a seating capacity for 512 people. The chairs both in the downstairs and in the gallery will be cushion-covered assuring those who become its patrons of the greatest comfort while witnessing the high class vaudeville and motion pictures which the management will present. It is planned to open the Empire on September 12 though the opening date may vary a few days from that date.

ORPHEUM THEATRE, BUTTE, MONT.

NEW MOBILE THEATRE.

Announcement has been made that a new theatre to show motion pictures and vaudeville is to be erected on the site of buildings 266-270 Dauphin street, Mobile, Ala. The building will be leased by Mrs. Blanch Turner to J. H. and C. B. King of the Crown theatre. The plans are for a two-story structure 35 by 126 feet and work of construction begins November 1. The theatre is expected to be ready for occupancy January 1, and will have a seating capacity of 500.

REPAIRS FOR JOLIET THEATRES.

Theatres throughout Joliet, Ill., are all receiving the benefit of the summer "closing up" period and are being redecorated and put in shape for the fall season.

The Joliet theater has been elaborately frescoed and tinted on walls and ceiling. A color scheme which blends well and improves the interior greatly has been arranged and the first nighters will scarcely recognize the place.

The Grand has also been subjected to a rigid cleaning process and will be fresh and spotless when it is again opened. The Colonial, Crystal Stairs and Tavern are also among the improved ones. All the first-class picture houses have been repaired prior to the fall opening.

NICKEL THEATRE RE-OPENS

Well Known Licensed Pictures Draw Large Crowds of Women and Children

After seven weeks of closed doors, the Cosy Nickel Theatre, of Haverhill, Mass., re-opened Aug. 14, to a large and anxious crowd of ladies and children and a good percentage of men, presenting a programme of pictures and songs that fulfilled all the promises of the management for the past week. Much could be said of the appearance of the theatre itself, entirely repainted, cleansed and with its hundred and one pleasing conveniences, and its polite and obliging attendants in uniform, but the thing that most impresses all is the splendid programme offered. It is doubtful if there was ever a motion picture that caused the sensation created by the feature of the new bill, "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest," a picture of cowboy life that defies description. "A Flash of Light," a Biograph story that makes one think, is another feature, also "The Majesty of the Law," a Vitagraph production of unusual strength. For laughing purposes there is shown "Pete Has a Good Time" and "Betty's Pranks," two of the funniest films that could have been secured.

Two splendid songs are offered by Miss Billie Wynn and William Grant, who both have voices that will make them immensely popular with local patrons.

Announcement has been made for the erection of a new motion picture and vaudeville theatre at Dauphin street, Birmingham, Ala. The ground has been leased from Mrs. Blanch Turner by J. H. and C. B. King, of the Crown Theatre.

places mentioned. Hearst's would-be reforming organs are moving heaven and earth to force Sheriff Strassheim of Cook County to stop the exhibition, but that officer cannot see his duty as dictated by the "Examiner" and "American."

The following extract from an issue of the last mentioned paper shows Sheriff Strassheim's stand:

"I am guided solely in this matter by the advice of Attorney Boreman. He will give out the reasons why I will not proceed against the pictures," said the sheriff.

"The sheriff is afraid of violating the law himself in stopping the pictures, and my advice to him is to leave them alone," said attorney Boreman. "He has not the authority to go in there and stop the exhibition, as I read the law."

Lawyer Sees No Violation.

Sheriff Strassheim was seated in the office of Attorney Boreman, when the latter was asked:

"Don't you think the fight pictures are brutalizing and degrading?"

"They are the reproduction of acts done in Reno, Nev. No law there is violated."

"But are they not contrary to the Illinois law?"

"No, I don't think so. I have read over the law regarding immoral pictures and do not believe that they come under the meaning of the statute. That is the reason I have advised Sheriff Strassheim to leave them alone. He is under heavy bond, and if he should cause the pictures to be suppressed he might be liable to a suit for $25,000 or more."

"If Bishop Samuel Fallows or others who want the pictures suppressed will give a bond to indemnify me I will make the arrests," broke in the Sheriff.

"No, Sheriff, I wouldn't do that, for I am doubtful whether that would relieve you from the original bond," said Attorney Boreman.

Will Serve Any Warrant.

"Well, then, I will withdraw that offer," decided the official. "I will not act on my own initiative. But I will serve a warrant that some one else swears out. That is as far as I will go."

"Why don't Bishop Fallows go out there and arrest them?" Attorney Boreman asked. "Any citizen has the power to make arrests in a misdemeanor case."

"Why have we a sheriff if he is not the one for law enforcement?" was suggested in answer.

"Well, I was just telling you the law," said the attorney.

"Then in the face of all the public opinion you advise the Sheriff to stand by and allow the pictures to run after they have been barred from Chicago and dozens of cities?" was asked.

"Yes, that is my advice to the Sheriff, for I believe he would be violating the law if he interfered with the exhibition of the pictures."

"I will follow Mr. Boreman's advice," was the Sheriff's final.

State's Attorney Wayman, after he heard of the decision of Sheriff Strassheim, said he would hold a conference with the official and his attorney.

"I have been so busy with the Browne trial that I have not had the time to pay attention to the fight picture problem in the county that I would like to have had, but will do all that I can to get to the bottom of it.

"However, the question of suppressing these pictures is up to Sheriff Strassheim. Any action at this time is for him. Of course, when Judge Brentano gives his decision in the suit of the promoters to force the city to grant a license, the Sheriff will have a court opinion upon which to work. If the court decides the pictures are immoral, the Sheriff must act." It was said today the Brentano decision would not be rendered before a week or ten days.

It will be noticed in one of the paragraphs quoted that the "American" assumes that the pictures have been "barred from Chicago." And this is brazenly printed in the same article which quotes State's Attorney Wayman's opinion that everything depends on Judge Brentano's decision, which will not be rendered for a week or ten days!

A Boost for Selig Pictures.

I received the following letter, last week, from Edward J. Cooper, manager of the Metropole theatre, Telluride, Colo., which shows that Selig pictures are in big demand out there.

"I am sending you a clipping to show what our people think of the Selig Pictures. I made more money on this picture than any other, barring 'The Cowboy Millionaire.'

"I am after Selig's 'Ranch Life in the Great Southwest,' and I think it to be a winner. I get 25 cents admission for such pictures."

I submit the clipping herewith, the Selig picture under discussion being, "The Fire Chief's Daughter:"

Last night nearly all the firemen responded to an invitation of Manager Edw. J. Cooper, of the Metropole Theatre, to attend his show at his expense and see a noted fire picture called the "Fire Chief's Daughter" which he put on, the "Examiner" will say that he never saw a more thrilling or a better picture. Usually these pictures give the impression that they are of the "canned variety," in other words made up and acted out, and perhaps this one was too, but if so, the actors and the stage properties were ideal. One sees the run of a couple of engines, a hook and ladder and a hose wagon, and the outfit is preceded by the one horse rig of the chief of the fire department. The run is long enough to thrill, and after the apparatus is stopped the firemen take their line of hose into the second story of the chief's residence and one of the firemen rescues the chief's wife from her bed room at the risk of his life, and gets out nearly burned to death, fainting with his

The Reason Why

THE MOTIOGRAPH Projects a Much Better Picture THAN OTHER MACHINES

Is that it is the only machine that has the PATENTED DOUBLE CONE SHUTTER

The Patented Double Cone Shutter does what other shutters will not do, because it shortens the time by two-thirds on both the opening and closing of the aperture.

1—The Light Aperture measures 36/32 in. from corner to corner and 22/32 in. high. (See Fig. 1.)

2—The Disc Shutter used in other machines travels from corner to corner 22/32 in. (See Fig. 2.)

3—The Double Cone Shutter travels top to bottom and bottom to top 22/32 in. (See Fig. 3.)

4—To close Light Aperture, the two wings meet half way with a travel of 11/32 inch each.

5—Saving in opening movement of cone shutter over disc type about 2/3.

6—Saving on closing movement is the same.

7—Thus a reduction of nearly 50 per cent. in the period of non-exposure, and

8—A gain of nearly 50 per cent. in the period of exposure or picture.

THE RESULT IS

9—A MUCH MORE BRILLIANT PICTURE and

10—NO FLICKER TO TIRE THE EYES.

No other machine has the Double Cone Shutter

BECAUSE IT'S PATENTED AND IT BELONGS TO THE MOTIOGRAPH EXCLUSIVELY.

Furthermore, the Motiograph has demonstrated that it will by long odds OUTWEAR OTHER MACHINES. It costs no more.

J. J. Daily, bookkeeper of the Vitagraph Company's Western office, has just returned from a vacation which was spent in Buffalo, Detroit, and northern Michigan. Mr. Daily states that the moving picture business is in very good shape wherever he has been, in Detroit and Buffalo more especially.

W. R. Scates, assistant manager of the General Film Co., this city, has suffered a relapse of his old trouble, pleurisy. He is confined to his home in the care of a physician, but is expected to be out shortly.

Mr. Arthur Kane, formerly connected with the O. T. Crawford Exchange of St. Louis, visited Chicago for a few hours, Saturday, Aug. 20. Mr. Kane was on his way from New York to join his wife in Omaha. He will shortly return to New York on business.

John Hardin, Western manager of the Edison Co. is now taking a short vacation, if vacation it can be called that compels him to keep in personal touch with the office at all times. He will be back in full harness at his desk on Monday, August 29.

Art. Steingart, owner and manager of the Illinois theatre on Milwaukee avenue, has just opened another theatre, the Peerless, on that busy thoroughfare. The new theatre is a handsome little house, with a capacity of about 300. Mr. Steingart uses moving pictures only in both his houses.

The Virginia theatre, on 43d street and Indiana avenue, after undergoing expensive improvements, opened up Saturday, Aug. 27.

The National theatre, 35th street and Grand Boulevard, was reopened by Manager Lyon, Saturday, August 20. Mr. Lyon formerly used the independent service; but, finding it unsatisfactory to his customers he is now taking licensed service from the General Film Co., this city.

The Playhouse, on West Madison and Lincoln streets, has just reopened after being redecorated and its seating capacity enlarged by the addition of 100 seats. This theatre is well known as one of the best paying houses on the West Side. It is owned by Mrs. Cook and managed by B. E. Drum, who is well and popularly known in licensed circles here.

Manager Goldberg, of the Castle theatre, Bloomington, Ill., and of the Majestic, Rockville, Ill., paid a visit to the General Film Co. last week and contracted for a high class service for both his houses.

While Lubin's "District Attorney" was being run in Geo. J. Gilmore's Ideal theatre on North avenue, one evening last week, a man in the audience fell into a epileptic fit. Much excitement was created by the incident among the women and children seated near him, but Mr. Gilmore and others succeeded in carrying him out to a side room, where he was treated by a physician that had been summoned. In the midst of the unfortunate man's contortions in the theatre, both his shoes had been pulled off and on his regaining his senses they were again placed on his feet, but in the hurry were left unbuttoned. The man then left the theatre. Shortly afterwards, Mr. Gilmore was passing manager Hyman's Janet theatre on North avenue and spied the same man standing in a dazed condition with one of his shoes off, he evidently having lost it. He drew Mr. Hyman's attention and told him of the occurence. "Serves you right for going back to the 'trust' " replied Mr. Hyman. "Oh, well, it would have been much worse had the poor devil been in an 'independent' theatre, for then he never would have woke up," said Gilmore, with one of his patent smiles. And Hyman let it go at that.

E. W. Lavezzi tells me that his improved star and cam which can be used with any make of machine, is proving satisfactory to all who have used them. Mr. Lavezzi also states that he is not manufacturing the star and cam but is only making improvements on those that have been turned out imperfectly at the factory by manufacturers. A patent has been applied for his improvement, and he has several testimonials that testify in high terms to its worth. Mr. Lavezzi tells me that the one-thousandth part of an inch variation in this delicate movement will cause a flicker or blur on the screen. Being a tool maker for many years, Mr. Lavezzi has devoted a great deal of time to the development of the fine points in this practical movement.

Synopsis of Production Issued by the Leading Song and Novelty Slide Makers

DE WITT C. WHEELER.

"BY THE MOSS COVERED WELL, DEAR ESTELLE."—Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L. Albert; published by J. H. Remick & Co. One of the timely love ballads, written in a reminiscent theme. Both lyrics and melody do full justice to the writers. The slides are of the truly Wheeler type that we like to see. They are of the dainty order, which appeal to the sense of beauty; posed in country style near a quaint old well, and are beautifully colored with the tone of nature.

"SUGAR MOON."—Published by J. H. Remick & Co. It is seldom in late years that a coon song becomes popular, but this one is certainly it, and looks like a hit. It is also seldom that we view a set of "darky" slides, so that when the opportunity is presented to do so, as in this set of Mr. Wheeler's, it is a novelty. The illustrations are full of characteristic southern poses of the black race. They are cleverly and amusingly carried out so as to make this set a very interesting one.

"SPOONLIGHT."—Words by Earle Clinton; music by Charlotte Blake; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. This is a true spooning song, and Mr. Clinton has taken full advantage of his subject and produced an exceptionally good set of lyrics. The melody has a clever swing which cannot fail to become popular. The slides do full justice to the song and are posed by good looking models who fall into natural poses. The moonlight effects reflect credit on the Wheeler slides, and the last slide is a girl surrounded with spoons, which produces a novel effect. An exceptionally good set of slides.

"IT'S MOONLIGHT ALL THE TIME ON BROADWAY."—Words by Ren Shields; music by Percy Wuerich; published by F. B. Haviland Publishing Co., New York. It would be useless to criticize either the lyrics or melody of this song, as these writers can always be depended upon to produce the goods, and they certainly have not failed in this instance. Mr. Wheeler has produced a set of slides every one of which is a novelty, and the effects of the Great White Way illuminated by night reproduced in a small lantern slide are truly wonderful. This set is without doubt the best set released by any slide maker, and shows what vast improvements are constantly being added to the productions of this house.

"I'M A LUCKY BOY TO HAVE A GIRL LIKE YOU." Words by Stanley Murphy; music by Percy Wenrich; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. It is a pretty story. Not only at the wedding nuptials, but after many happy years of married life the husband feels ever lucky to have for a wife the one he possesses. The slides tell the story in a quaint way, giving many phases of country life and true love upon the farm.

"WHEN THE SUMMER DAYS ARE GONE."—Words by Leo Curley; music by Geo. Christie; published by Witmark & Sons. While the summer days are not yet gone, this song may seem unseasonable, but it was so good the publishers couldn't wait, so published it ahead of time. The slides by Wheeler certainly do show some fine selections of scenery by him. It would seem that all the beauties of nature full bloom in the summertime are pent up in this little set. Seashore, mountains, rivers, lakes and woods are all here, beautifully colored and charming to look at.

"BAND, BAND, BAND."—Words by Seymour Brown; music by Nat. D. Ayer; published by J. H. Remick & Co. As the name implies, this is a novelty song, [illegible] in a novel way to a novel idea, and shows progressive ideas in song writing. The slides are one of Wheeler's best comedy sets. He shows us a very beautiful girl leading a band around the street. The costumes of the players are, of course, brilliant and dazzling. The coloring is exquisite, and there are plenty of novelties. But best of all is the model. It is worth getting the set to see her.

"I LOVE YOU, DEAR."—Words by Blair Leyton; [illegible] published by Sydney P. Harris, Detroit, Mich. A beautiful set of lyrics in the true love strain, set to a fine melody. This is one of the love ballads that are so difficult to illustrate. But Wheeler makes the slides interesting, no matter what the song is. This is an example.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON.

"DON'T YOU WISH IT WAS SUMMER."—By Nora Bayes and Jack Norworth. This is the song the above mentioned artists have been making such a hit with all summer in the "Jolly Bachelors," taking any number of encores at every performance. The song has just been released for general use. Simpson has made a set of slides quite worthy of this charming number, both artistic and illustrative of the theme of the story. The girl is exquisitely dainty, and the coloring beautiful. This song is published by the Norworth Pub. Co.

"YOU ARE THE IDEAL OF MY DREAMS."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of "All That I Ask of You is Love," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night." Published by Shapiro. This is one of the ballad hits of the year. After all, heart interest is the thing, and no one can escape the touch of sentiment conveyed by this delightful song as sung by Frank Morrell at Hammerstein's Theatre. The slides Simpson has sent out for this song are beautiful. His models are well chosen and extremely good looking, the photography is excellent and the coloring beyond criticism.

"THE BARBER SHOP CHORD."—Words by Wm. Tracey; music by Lewis F. Muir; published by J. Fred. Helf Publishing Co. This song is the feature song of the Lew Dockstadter show this season, and is also being sung with great success by Bert Williams. Simpson has made a great set of pictures; each slide of artistic merit. Two really clever artists posed for this song, and Simpson was right there with that wonderful camera of his to reproduce with such rare fidelity to nature just the exact expression that would best convey the spirit of the song. The two models are Miss Carlotta Freeman, late of the Pekin Stock Co., and Lawrence Chenault, of the Smart Set Co. This set of slides is a distinct addition to any program.

"AMO."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham; published by Shapiro. This is an exquisitely beautiful love song with a tender haunting melody such as is characteristic of all of the compositions of the versatile author of such world-famous hits as "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night," etc. Simpson has made a set of slides that do full justice to this song. The models are a dark-eyed senorita and her toreador lover in the national costumes of Spain. The scenery is typically Spanish, with rich and glorious tropical coloring.

SCOTT & VAN ALTENA.

"I WANT TO BUY A LITTLE BIT OF LOVE."—By Chas. K. Harris. This is the pathetic story of a little girl who was under the care of a step mother. She went one day with a few pennies to a candy store to ask if she could not buy a little bit of love. The step mother happened in the store, heard the call of the child's soul and straightway opened her heart to her, becoming thereafter almost a real mother. The slides tell the story in a very interesting manner, for the child is so cute that one could not help but bestow upon it the deepest affection.

"TAKE ME WITH YOU, CUTY, AND FORGET TO BRING ME BACK."—That listens well. Surely with such lyrics, catchy music, and illustrations posed for by such charming models, this song cannot help but become at once popular at picture theatres. It has a light, breezy air that cheers, dispelling all gloom and displeasure. Published by Leo. Feist.

"THE HONEYMOON GLIDE."—Words by Jos. H. McKeon; music by W. Raymond Walker; published by Harry Von Tilzer Pub. Co. This song has an air that is a hummer. Hear it once and you'll want to hear it six times, as well as join in on the chorus. It is one of those songs that make you feel lively and happy. The slides, posed for by a very pretty little miss and handsome youth, are very striking. Novelties, as usual, a-plenty.

"UNDER THE YUM YUM TREE."—Words by Sterling; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Von Tilzer Music Co. We have all been there—under the yum yum tree—gazing into loving eyes and whispering soft foolishness, etc. The song surely is a good one, one of Von Tilzer's best, which is saying a good deal. Each slide in this fine set has the stamp of quality, the quality which gives the work of Scott & Van Altena a certain character which we all know.

"MY DIXIE DREAM."—Published by Harry Von Tilzer Music Pub. Co., New York; words and music by Earle Taylor, writer of "My Southern Rose." Another Southern song by this author that bids fair to have the same popularity as his preceding one. The slides for this song are in typical Scott & Van Altena style—cleverly posed, more than excellently colored and containing novelties galore. The models, too, are good looking and very graceful.

"LITTLE STAR WONT YOU TWINKLE."—Lyrics by Tell Taylor; melody by Chas. L. Johnson; published by Harold Rossiter Music Co. A beautiful ballad by Chas. Johnson, writer of "Iola," "Dill Pickles" and other hits. Most of the pictures are moonlight scenes, and are extremely well executed, considering that it is so difficult to imitate moonlight scenes. The set is well supplied with novelties, which are striking and original. The models are exceptionally good looking. Taking all in all the set is really unique.

"LOVE DREAMS."—Words and music by Luella Lockwood Moore; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co. This is a beautiful little love ballad that tells of a young Venetian couple who fall desperately in love with one another. The illustrations show the pair on the canals of Venice, beautiful gondolas, pomp and gaiety. The pretty little model in this instance is she who posed for the slides of Scott & Van Altena's "Espanolia Sprance." She is dark and beautiful, fitting well the part of a Venetian daughter. The male model, too, is just the one for this kind of a song. Coloring is beautiful and the scenic effects charming and wonderful.

"DEAR MAYME, I LOVE YOU."—Words by Irving Berlin; music by Ted Snyder; published by the Ted Snyder Co., New York. These two authors need no recommendation. Their many successes have been heard by all and any new composition by them is looked for eagerly. Slides by Scott & Van Altena form another of their many novelty sets. They are new and interesting, illustrating well this little love waltz.

LEVI COMPANY.

"ROSY CHEEKS."—Words by Dave Oppeheim; music by Joe Cooper; published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. This is a real novelty song, one that will make any audience sit up and take notice. The Levi Co. have discovered a most beautiful girl, now playing in "Up and Down Broadway," who fits the title to perfection, and is sure to carry this song to a tremendous popularity. In the photography, posing and coloring of this set the Levi Co. have reached the highest point in the art of making song slides.

"STELLA, DEAR,"—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams. A beautiful march ballad with a melody that is simply fascinating. Easy to sing and one that stays with you. The slides are very beautiful, both models being exceptionally good looking, and the photography and coloring excellent. A first class set of slides in every particular.

"ANY LITTLE GIRL, THAT'S A NICE LITTLE GIRL, IS THE RIGHT LITTLE GIRL FOR ME."—Words by Thomas J. Gray; music by Fred Fischer; published by M. Shapiro. This is the biggest hit published by M. Shapiro within the last three years, and the melody is being whistled by almost every street urchin. The slides are good.

"JUST FOR A GIRL."—Published by M. Witmark & Sons. This song is the biggest number that the Witmark concern has put out in some time and is an absolute hit. Slides are first class in every particular, and are beautiful. The demand will be heavy owing to the extreme popularity of the song and you should place your order immediately.

"JESSAMINE."—Words and music by Frank B. Williams; published by Shapiro. A pretty love ballad surpassing many of its kind published heretofore. A set of slides by Levi that delight the audience.

"BYE BYE, SWEETHEART."—Words and music by Will Wood. A little gem of a song, refined and melodious. The slides contain many bright and snappy novelties and illustrate well this love song.

"WHEN THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET WAS NEW."—Words by Geo. Moriarity; music by Joe Cooper, writers of the big song hit, "I Can't Miss That Ball Game." Published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. The melody is very sweet and worthy of a pronounced success. Slides in typical Levi style illustrate the lyrics in an interesting fashion.

"AS THE TRAIN ROLLED AWAY."—Words by Arthur A. Myers; music by Sidney T. Wilson. This song is above the average in many ways. Slides by Levi tell the story in a simple manner, and together with the novelties.

"VALLEY FLOWER."—Words and music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills, New York. An Indian song of merit, as are most of the songs exploited by these publishers. The posing is typical Indian style, and shows many new phases of Indian life. For those fond of Indian pictures this set should appeal.

ACTORS AT PLAY

Vitagraph Takes Motion Views of Actors Fund Field Day Capers—All the Live Ones Were There

Such doings were never done and probably never will be done again as those which were pulled off at the Actors Fund Field Day at the Polo Grounds in New York City, Friday, Aug. 19. Twenty thousand persons saw them and there are several millions who would like to see them and can see them as reproduced by the Vitagraph Company. This film shows some of the "cutups" in a thousand and one capers. Eddie Foy, Bert Williams, Marie Dressler, Lew Fields, Marshall P. Wilder, George M. Cohan, Victor Moore, Jim Corbett, Tim Sullivan, Joe Humphreys, Emma Carus, Louis Mann, Terry McGovern and a whole lot of celebrities were there and did things never performed upon any stage.

The greased pig chase was a howl—the hobble skirt race a scream and the pie eating contest was a huckleberry bath surrounded by crust, it produced convulsions of laughter. The baseball game between the 'skirts' and 'trousers' umpired by Marsh Wilder—it makes you laugh every time you think of it. These stunts and more besides, including the big parade are seen on this Vitagraph film as the actors let loose.

Miss Virginia Pearson, who was a member of the Vitagraph Stock Company, is to play the Vampire this season in "A Fool There Was."

Mr. and Mrs. Ben S. Morris of the Court Street Theatre, Wheeling, W. Va., visited the Vitagraph Studio this week. They were astonished at the immensity of the Vitagraph Plant and expressed great satisfaction at meeting the "Vitagraph Girl" and Mr. Costello, whom they called the "Vitagraph Man."

Three of the life portrayals for the next week are "The Calico Doll," Aug. 30, in which Jean the intelligent collie dog will appear. "A Life For a Life," Sept. 2, a story of a convict who proves himself a hero. "The Wrong Box," on Aug. 3. An exchange of boxes, one containing a suit of pajamas, the other a bouquet of flowers. The pajamas are sent to a young lady instead of the bouquet. You can imagine the rest.

This communication received by the Vitagraph Company may interest the business at large:

"Dear Sirs: I bought a horse last week and he has a kick in either foot when you want it, where you want it and how you want it, now I'll make you a proposition to have my horse pose for a picture for you if you so desire. Must be soon because I intend to send Hercules to the country, that is his name. He'll kick in and out of harness to suit his own pleasure and yours just for sociability sake. Now if you want an Equine Artist of Artistic Temperament of the first quality address me. I won't let Hercules pose for less than Sixty Dollars as it shall mean the destruction of a rig and set of harness not counting my services as driver. I'll willingly cut the price if you supply the driver. Address, truly yours, "R. S. Beal, New York City."

SHEAR IN NEW YORK

Representative of Imported Film Supply Co., of New Orleans Makes Social Call to the Film Index

Another one of our friends from the "Land of Dixie" to visit the office of The Film Index last week, was A. G. Shear, manager of the Imported Film & Supply Co., of 840 Union street, New Orleans. Mr. Shear, who was accompanied by his wife, had a great time in the Metropolis, and is not going to let anything pass on the "boards" along old Broadway.

Before reaching New York Mr. and Mrs. Shear made stops at Washington, Atlantic City and Asbury Park.

Getting down to business in the "Crescent City," Mr. Shea assures us that good pictures are the real thing. All the houses, both in and around New Orleans, have no complaint and future prospects are all that can be desired. Mr. and Mrs. Shear left for their Southern home last Friday, after a week's stay in the city.

"BRIDGES BURNED" A WINNER.

That well-known love story "Bridges Burned" will always be a monument to Rex Beach; but since it is being acted in motion pictures the name of the author will spread into parts almost unknown.

At the Pastime theatre, Albuquerque, N. Mex., "Bridges Burned" was the hit of last week's picture entertainment. "Father's Pride" one of Biograph's well-known films, was a hit.

never seen before. It was a very dark green lettered glass frame around the screen, with a dark red vine design worked into the glass and illuminated from behind with very small incandescent lamps which furnished light enough to bring out the design and furnished an effective frame for the picture, without being bright enough to be too prominent, or detract in any way from the picture on the screen."

CHURCH FOR MOTION PICTURES.

Plans have been filed for making over the two-story church at No. 743 Tenth avenue, just north of the West Side Neighborhood House, and which is known as the Armitage Chapel, connected with the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, into a moving picture show place at a nominal cost. The alterations will not be extensive, consisting of enlarging the platform and installing a fireproof screen and building an operator's booth. The chapel is owned by John D. Rockefeller, jr., according to the plans filed.

BIO CARBONS

When we began advertising BIO Carbons we prepared for an enormous demand.

We knew it could not fail to come.

We had placed samples in the hands of competent operators in every state in the Union asking them to make a fair, unbiased report.

In not one single case did the result fail to justify every claim we made.

Every operator reported better pictures, more light and longer burning life than he had EVER obtained from any other carbon.

We then placed the carbon on the market, with the result that today the enormous demand for BIO Carbons has absorbed the entire output of our factories for the next thirty days, in addition to our large stock.

We have reserved a few hundred thousand to take care of you who were late in "waking up." We will give preference to sample orders, and will fill all sample orders for 50⅝ x 6 inch Cored Carbons at $1.50 as advertised.

Write your name here today if you want to try BIO Carbons this month.

The MAN WHO DIED

Another somewhat different story with the Lubin photographic quality. The man did not die in reality, he was carried away by a couple of particularly joyous joy riders and he came back to his home with health and a wife to throw out the thankless brother whose grief over the death is pictured below. A corking good title for the front of the house, and a splendid picture for the screen.

Released Monday, September 5th

FAITH

There is no more vital question before the public than the suppression of the White Plague and The Healing Faith is a novel handling of this topic. The camp scenes were made at White Haven, N. J., one of the most famous centres of the open air treatment, but this is not a preachment; it is a romance of a faithful woman's great love. Interest your local physicians in this story and crowd your theatre.

CASUAL COMMENT

OUR "revival" suggestion, and the expression of exhibitors in response thereto, seems about to be adopted by the Lubin Manufacturing Company, which intimates that it may soon bring out one of its famous old subjects, "Meet Me At the Fountain." This "revival" will have all the advantages of the present day improvements in photography and settings and should be as big a scream as it formerly was.

Since taking up this matter of "revivals" it has been said that the old pictures which seemed so good long ago would be very disappointing today, owing to the great improvement that has been made in picture making during the past year or so. This leads us to surmise that our idea of revivals has not been clearly understood. We did not mean to convey the impression that the old negative was to be used and that we were to have simply a reprint of a picture that was made under former conditions. Our thought was that the producer would take the old subject over again under the present conditions of improved photography and staging and acting—everything new but the story.

THERE is an opportunity for theatre managers and operators of motion picture machines to obtain a liberal education on the interesting and, to them, important subject of electricity through the columns of The Film Index. Read and study the "Electrical Talks," written by J. H. Hallberg and when he has finished the subject, if you are not an expert electrician no one but yourself will be to blame. We wish to caution all interested to begin now, as it will be impossible to provide readers who come late with back numbers.

THERE are so many good things in this issue of The Index that we are unable to enumerate all of them here. The best way is to read the paper through yourself. Several of our readers have written us complimentary letters upon the appearance of the paper and of the value of the subject matter that it has been giving them. We are thankful for the appreciation and hope that everyone will feel the same way about it. One thing that is most gratifying is the steady increase of advertising patronage. Looks as though we would have to add some more pages. On the quiet, we have a plan under way to do just that thing, but don't say a word till you see what it is, which will be very soon.

WHETHER it is a motion picture or a song slide that is "duped" the offense is just as great. In either case the duper steals the brains and enterprise of the originator. In the case of copyrighted and trade marked subjects there is a criminal violation of the law involved. The Film Index has denounced all dupers on numerous occasions and is in hearty sympathy with the efforts of one of the leading song slide makers to hold up to the public gaze a concern that has been guilty of duping slides. The evidence seems to be complete in this case, even to an admission on the part of the duper. The publicity thus given to an unbusinesslike and highly reprehensible practice should have the effect of stopping that sort of thing.

YES; IT'S SO

With becoming modesty we submit the following communication:

Pittsburg, Pa., 8-30-'10.

Allison & Taylor,
The Film Index, New York City.

Gentlemen: We desire to extend our thanks for the publicity given the decision of Attorney-General O'Malley of New York State relative to the Jeffries-Johnson fight films, as you can readily appreciate the influence this will have all over the country. It seems that The Film Index is the leader in putting all facts before the trade pertaining to matters of this kind.

Kindly forward us 50 of this issue at once, C. O. D., and oblige, Very truly yours,

CHAS. A. TAYLOR.

Circumstances compel us to admit the truth of the above communication, especially what the writer says about The Film Index being "the leader in putting all facts before the trade."

It is an agreeable position to occupy in relation to any trade—that of the leading trade paper, and The Index will strive to maintain its position of supremacy.

Right here we desire to thank the writer of the letter quoted, and many others who have written us expressing the same opinion. A bit of appreciation goes a long ways now and then.

CAN REPEAT GOOD SUBJECTS

Lower, of Yankton, Says They Need Not Be Retired Because Shown Once

While there has been no wild rush to endorse the suggestions made by The Film Index that there should be a revival of old subjects of merit, the occasional communication received indicates that there are a few thinking exhibitors. Here is one letter that interests us because the writer has the correct idea of the value of a good picture, also, because his list of subjects just about meets our own idea of what are good subjects and worthy of revival.

Yankton, S. Dak., Aug. 23, 1910.

Editor The Film Index.

Dear Sir: Your article in Film Index on reviving subjects that have made a hit is a very timely one. There are so many excellent films that I could easily make a long list. However, I will mention a few. Those with "X" we have repeated successfully and those with "XX" were shown at another house here. We ran the film again a few days following and advertised the fact that it was a repeater to demonstrate the idea that the subject need not be retired from active life, because it had been shown once. A good subject can be repeated to an average American audience and they enjoy it as they would any play they had seen before. The enclosed list are subjects I have in mind that were talked about long after:

The Wonders of Nature—Essanay.
The Mended Lute—Biograph—X
The Convict No. 796—Vitagraph.
The Lost Trail—Vitagraph.
How Championships Are Won and Lost—Vitagraph—X.
Custer's Last Stand—Selig—X.
The Adventuress—Essanay.
St. Elmo—Vitagraph—XX.
The Little Doctor of Foothills—Essanay—XX.
Ramona—Biograph.
Pippa Passes—Biograph.
Mario's Swan Song.
Story of a Rose—Kalem.
World's Fastest Boat.
The Sealed Room—Biograph.
The Man Without a Country—Edison—X.
Laddie—Edison.

Religious and industrial subjects are too numerous to mention and many comedy subjects. Classical subjects always draw large crowds in our city. But the enclosed are "The Cream" of our past programs and could be repeated with proper advertising. Yous truly,

E. M. LOWER,
Scenic Theatre.

You will observe that Mr. Lower speaks from experience. He has repeated pictures in his own house and knows that the plan is good. Next.

How a Train Robber's Plot Was Balked by a Plucky Girl.

AMONG the coming releases scheduled by G. Melies is an interesting picture story entitled "A Plucky American Girl" that is worked out with good effect by the Melies players. The story is of a little girl who defeats the plans of a murderous gang of train robbers and assists in their capture.

In this picture a regular express train is held up and all the equipment of a railroad has been commandered by the picture makers to get the proper effects.

In photographic quality the picture is up to the mark, and the efforts of the girl to warn the train and bring assistance are truly girlish and convincing.

BUFFALO BILL PICTURES

That there is a merry war on in the film game may be evidenced from the fact of contention over the Buffalo Bill Wild West pictures—there are two kinds—Carl Goldenberg offers a set of pictures, and along comes Pat Powers of moving picture fame—(needless to say that Mr. Goldenberg until very recently was for years prominently identified with Pathe Freres),

Kalem's "Japanese Spy" Gives Glimpses of Pine Plains Maneuvers

UNDER the title of "A Japanese Spy" the Kalem Co. have produced a picture which gives glimpses of the big camp of instruction at Pine Plains, New York, that are of more than passing interest.

At this camp during the past several weeks have been several thousand U. S. Regulars and New York State Militia playing at the great game of war. The maneuvers intended to instruct the citizen soldiery in the grim realities of actual warfare, have been under the direction of Major General Fred D. Grant, Commander of the Department of the East, and many novel features of modern warfare have been illustrated.

While the Kalem Co. secured several thousand feet of negative showing the scope and methods of attack and defense and the utilization of balloons and aero planes in conjunction with the several branches of the army, its principal efforts was directed toward the elaboration of an interesting war story under the title named.

A Japanese baron has been detailed to secure information regarding the American Army. He bids farewell to his family, departs on his dangerous mission. Disguised as a peddler he penetrates the lines and explores the camp, gaining the headquarters of the commandant and learning of the plan of battle.

When discovered he makes his escape followed by mounted officers, but eludes them and gets safely away for the time being.

But the spy's operations have been reported to the U. S. Secret Service and a young woman is detailed to hunt him down. After a considerable chase she causes the Baron's arrest just as he is about to board a steamship for Japan when he is captured. Upon being taken to a room and searched the incriminating information is found upon the Baron, who then commits suicide to escape the disgrace of failure.

Later a delegation of high Japanese officials call upon the Baron's family and a memorial service in his honor is celebrated.

The Kalem Co. has introduced a number of real Japanese in this picture and the interior of the Japanese home is characteristic.

When rehearsing the Japanese in their scenes the Jap selected to impersonate the Governor who headed the delegation that called upon the widow to express their condolences, did not perform to suit the ideas of the other Japs, so they hurriedly deposed him and gave the place of honor to another of their number. The keen eyed director noted the change, which had been made without his knowledge and learned, upon inquiry that the one first selected could not have made a good governor. The matter was adjusted by the Japs among themselves and to their entire satisfaction.

In speaking of the war game Director Buell of the Kalem Co. observed that there was a great mystery surrounding modern warfare. On one day when there was to be a general engagement between Red and Blue forces, as the rival divisions of the forces were named, he was called in and advised with great show of secrecy of the plans. Afterward he drove about the battle field as directed for fully twelve hours and, though the fighting seemed to be fast and furious all about him he barely got a glimpse of more than a score of combatants all day.

SCENES FROM THE KALEM SUBJECT, "A JAPANESE SPY."

Mr. Goldenberg offers a set of slide pictures taken while the "Wild West-Far East" was at Madison Square Garden and afterwards on the road. Every picture is colored and each show some scene in action. Mr. Goldenberg was fortunate enough to catch Col. Cody with the camera in many unique positions, none of which have ever been reproduced in print. The set numbers twenty-five slides and covers the entire show from beginning to end.

From the opening to finish the interest is maintained. Every detail stands out clearly, there are pictures of bucking broncos, the attack on the stage coach, the greatest of Indian pictures showing Iron Tail, chief of the Ogallala Sioux and many other Indians who at one time fought Buffalo Bill.

These pictures were not taken hurriedly—out of nearly six hundred negatives used, these were selected as being the best, those really showing the great Wild West as it really is. From start to finish the interest is never permitted to lag—always something doing, something of particular interest.

Mr. Goldenberg is quite sure that the slide pictures will be a sensational hit; every one shows action and each is taken with particular care to please the patrons of moving picture theatres.

There are only two chances to see Buffalo Bill. If he has played your city he will never come back, and if he hasn't here is the best way to witness the performance, away from the dust and excitement. In the twenty-five slides that Mr. Goldenberg puts out you will see the entire show just as it is playing today.

NEW HOME FOR NOVELTY SLIDE CO.

So as to be in a better position to handle their large local business, the Novelty Slide Company have removed from their East 53d street building to No. 63 Fifth avenue, corner 13th street, New York City.

The products of this concern are very much in demand by exhibitors everywhere, and their latest novelty in the way of "next day feature" slides, are meeting with great success and big sales. These slides are cleverly designed to advertise the next day feature, and are gotten up for all makes of film, including the manufacturers' trademark. Without question these slides are of great help to picture theatre owners, and the unanimous report is that they increase business.

"THE LAST OF THE SAXONS"

The Vitagraph's Spectacular, Historical Drama

ONE of the most difficult undertakings of moving picture production is an historical subject dating back to the early centuries. ""The Last of the Saxons" is laid in the eleventh century, a very picturesque and wildly romantic period affording an excellent chance for costumes, armour and weapons of war. And there is nothing neglected or slighted in this Vitagraph portrayal and its scenic details, and at the same time tells a rich and rare love story of ancient tradition.

There were very many amusing and thrilling features connected with the directing and arranging of this picture. There was a large number of horses necessary to give the proper effect at the battle of Hastings and, while some of them were ancient enough, they were not accustomed to armored riders and emblazoned trappings. They had to be rehearsed and trained to do the charge and keep within the lines of the camera. The flying arrows from the Norman hordes put plenty of ginger into them and they soon got a move on that looked enough like the real thing to keep the actors guessing as to just where they were going to land. Some of the riders had to be shot, or pretend to be; they had to fall from the horses, and they did it quite naturally, too naturally for some of them, as they afterwards remarked when they were lined up by the Vitagraph Ambulance Corps for repairs.

Harold, the King of England, took a tumble when he was pierced in the heart by an arrow from William the Conqueror's Archers; and he was very glad to lay there until the charge of horsemen was out of the picture, and he didn't open his eyes or move for fear of getting a kick in the "coco." And he looked quite natural as a dead person is usually said to look by his admiring friends.

There is one scene in particular in this picture which is as imposing as it is impressive; that is the cathedral scene where Harold marries Aldyth. The depth of the nave is tremendous, showing the entrance aisle clear back to the chancel; plainly showing the altar with bishops, priests and satelites participating in the marriage ceremony. The procession headed by the bishop starts from the chancel rail and comes forward down the long passage way presenting a most inspiring spectacle.

There was an immense congregation employed in this cathedral scene; every available man, woman and child in the studio and neighborhood were called into service in addition to all the extras employed. Mr. A. E. Smith was directing the picture and lost no time in making knights, lords, dukes and barons out of every mother's son of them, although Superintendent French and Mr. McIntosh of the negative department insist he made monkeys out of them. Mr. Sturgeon of the manuscript department felt that he was a born baron, lacking only in curly locks and flowing robes. When he stepped from the costume room arrayed in these the disguise was complete. "Auto John," tried to fasten his tunic around his waist and insisted upon wearing his collar and necktie. They all passed in the crowd, however, and were soon lost in the merry throng.

These are some of the sidelights thrown on the taking of a big picture. If it were not for these diversions which naturally attend the handling of large crowds of "extras" and "supers" the strain would tax the most experienced director, and it requires a specialist to do it successfully as it has been done in this comprehensive depiction.

The Vitagraph Co. has gained a reputation producing pictures like "The Last of the Saxons," and this will add to its popularity and success.

NEW PICTURE THEATRE FOR NEW LONDON

In spite of the fact that it is already well supplied with that kind of amusement places, New London, Conn., is to have another motion picture theatre. The utilization of Lawrence hall for that purpose will be likely to interfere seriously with the profits of the other enterprises of that sort, even if those who conduct it do not get rich in catering to the public entertainment. For a great many years Lawrence hall was the only theatre in this city, and a great many very prominent players have been seen on its stage. The hall has the advantage of good size, but its owner never spent very much money on it, and it always remained a hall, although it was for quite a number of years known as an "opera house." As long as Sebastian D. Lawrence lived, there was small chance of the room being utilized very much. Mr. Lawrence placed a good rental on the place, and those who used it had to come up with the cash in advance or there was no show. The stage was never given a modern equipment, and the same set of scenery did service in many kinds of plays. Now that the property is in other hands, it is evident that there is an intention of making it pay, and as it is centrally located, it will no doubt be in demand, if the present lessees do not make a go of their venture.

MULLER'S BRONX CASINO REFITTED.

Mr. George W. Muller, who has refitted his concert hall at 154th street and Third avenue, New York city, into one of the most modern motion picture and vaudeville theatre, opened up for business September 3. The complete electric economizer, M. P. machine, ventilating and illuminating equipment was furnished and installed by J. H. Hallberg. The equipment includes a new design Hallberg Economizer which takes in alternating current and delivers direct current for the two motion picture machines and double dissolving stereopticon lamps. The economizer saves 50 per cent.

AN EDISON GROUP

First Canadian Picture Splendid Production — Some Comedies

WHEN the Edison Stock Company of picture players went to Northwestern Canada for local color, there was considerable speculation regarding the class of pictures they would bring back with them. Now that they have returned and the first subject of the Canadian series has been announced for an early release, the problem is about to be solved. It is the privilege of The Film Index to give a tip as to what the answer is through a private view of the first release "An Unselfish Love."

Lest our readers should be disappointed in our personal estimate of this picture we refuse to tell just how well we liked it, for there is always the possibility that others will not discover the same meaning in it that appealed to us; all do not see things alike.

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "AN UNSELFISH LOVE."

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "BUMPTIOUS AS A FIREMAN."

To say that it is a great picture, photographically, or scenically, or that it tells a novel story in a convincing manner does not hit the mark at all. The great point is the way in which the story is told. It is the acting that counts in this picture.

According to the story the lover is rejected by the girl's father and goes to the Canadian Northwest to win a fortune that will give him the right to claim the girl, despite the father. There he meets an old maid (an appellation hateful in this case), who falls secretly in love with him and endeavors to convey her heart's message to him by frequent gifts of flowers. So deeply is the young man buried in his own troubles that he does not grasp the meaning of the offerings and his disposition of the frequent gifts injects a bit of comedy that is amusing and would be laughable if it were not pathetic.

While this is going on the father of the girl back in the home town is urging her to marry a wealthy admirer of his choice. By various tricks he gains the girl's consent and the wedding is announced. An announcement is sent to the faraway lover which he gets at the post office. He does not open the letter at once, but goes to his home filled with hope of good news. Seated at his writing table he sets the only girl's photograph before him and studies the features intently and lovingly. Then he opens the letter and learns the heart-breaking truth.

When he recovers from the shock he commences a wild condemnatory letter to the girl, but is interrupted by approaching steps and makes a hasty escape. As the man goes out the maiden lady, with her inevitable floral offering, enters. Finding no one at home she places the flowers on the mantel and then turns to caress the chair, still warm from the presence of the only man she has ever loved. Next, she seats herself reverently in his chair. It is as though she were clasped in his arms. From this ecstacy she is aroused by the picture of the only girl, which she inspects with alarm. Then the wedding announcement is scanned and finally the letter just begun reveals the mystery of the man and her own hopelessness.

It is a trying situation, but in that woman's heart of hearts there is formed a quick resolve. She takes the wedding announcement and the letter and hides them in her bosom and departs quietly and tearfully, as from the grave of her fondest hope, for such it really is.

She is next seen at the home of the girl pleading with her to run away and join the only man —her lover in the far Northwest. In this she succeeds, for the heart of woman is strong.

Returning to the man we find him in rage and despair; he rends the picture of the girl and casts it from him, and buries his head in his arms upon the table. A woman enters unnoticed and touches his shoulder; he raises his head to see the old maid and the everlasting flowers and rudely pushes her away. Cruelly hurt, the woman turns, opens the door and beckons. The only girl enters and touches the man's shoulder. He does not respond at first; but when he does look up there is another vision before him.

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "A JAR OF CRANBERRY SAUCE."

Realizing for the first time the quiet devotion of the old maid, the man grasps her hand and presses it to his lips. The lovers embrace and the old maid stumbles out, forgotten and alone. As she passes through the gate she pauses to touch her lips to the spot on her hand touched by the lips of the man—the only reward of her unselfish love.

Do you grasp the dramatic possibilities of this plot? Do you appreciate the depth of sentiment it reveals? Possibly not in this brief telling, but when you see it unfold in the picture it will seem real to you, for the Edison players have approached the task imposed upon them with due reverence and their work is sincere and convincing.

TWO GOOD COMEDIES.

"Almost a Hero" and "A Jar of Cranberry Sauce" are the titles of two comedies which will appear on one reel to be released soon by the Edison company.

"Almost a Hero" gives away some of the "tricks of the trade" of picture making, and is a highly amusing revelation of the attempts of Claude of the ribbon counter, to become a regular hero. After a strenuous course of training in which he eventually succeeds in elevating a half-pound dumb-bell, he manages to spoil at least three pictures in his endeavors to save the lady; then, having been stung three times in the same place, he flatly refuses to save a beautiful girl attacked by a tramp on a lonely road, realizing his mistake only when another fellow steps in and wins the resulting reward. Some laughs in this.

"A Jar of Cranberry Sauce" is an amusing farce comedy in which the parsimony of Uncle Reuben leads to the appearance of a deed of violence in a city hotel which misleads the man in the adjoining room to give an alarm of murder, which a subsequent investigation by the police reveals to be false. It is really funny and you are sure to laught with Uncle Reuben at the finish.

BUMPTIOUS, A FIREMAN.

After you have seen a few of these Edison "Bumptious" farces you will come to expect something worth laughing at each time one is announced. The next, "Bumptious As a Fireman," is due next week and is just as good as any that have appeared. How Bumptious wins his title as chief of the country fire department and how valiantly he acquits himself at the first fire is certain to tickle your funny bone. Then there's the imperturbable gum-chewing girl. Nothing phazes her.

NEW PICTURE THEATRE FOR SAVANNAH.

The Southern Amusement Company of Savannah, Ga., is to give Broughton street east another place of amusement. The store at No. 28 Broughton street east, which was occupied for several years by M. Wilensky, is to be thoroughly done over and transformed into the prettiest moving picture house Savannah has ever seen.

The work of tearing out the interior of the place for the installation of the seats and other paraphernalia for putting on the pictures will begin at once. The house is to be unique in one regard. It will have the highest ceilings of any play house of its size in the city. The entire second floor is to be torn out. This will add much to the looks of the interior of the house after it is decorated as it will be.

It is expected to have the house ready for opening within the next sixty days. It will be under the same management as the Orpheum, which is the most successful vaudeville house in the South. It is proposed to give a show every hour from three o'clock in the afternoon until midnight. The price of admission will be ten cents. The house, when completed, will seat between 300 and 500 people and there is no reason why it should not be kept crowded most of the time.

Contracts for preparing the new house for occupancy were let to-day and the work will probably begin on Monday.

SERIAL PICTURES

Mandelbaum Discovers Way to Make Them a Big Feature.

With the majority of exchanges and exhibitors the production of picture subjects in more than one reel has been considered as a great nuisance, a detriment to the business. Because of the few subjects thus issued there has been much grumbling and kicking. From this manufacturers were led to believe that serial pictures like "The Life of Moses," were not wanted by the public.

It seems now that the fault was not with the public, but with the exhibitors and the exchanges who did not know how to handle serial pictures to the best advantage. This statement is proved conclusively by the experience of the Lake Shore Film & Supply Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, as related in a letter to The Film Index which reads as follows:

Editor The Film Index,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Knowing you to be interested in things general pertaining to the Motion Picture business, whether it pertains to manufacturer, renter or exhibitor, we believe that you would like to learn of the following experiment which we made some weeks ago. Useless to state, there is some satisfaction in it for us to advise you of the outcome and you undoubtedly will agree that the scheme is a novel one.

On July 26, the Vitagraph Company issued the first reel of the series of Uncle Tom's Cabin and on the 29th and 30th Parts II. and III., which completed the series. At first we rented these three films out as individual reels, which fact was necessitated by our giving them to first run customers. The comments that were made were very few and not very favorable. We were satisfied that the three films taken as a whole were meritorious and deserving of praise and it was then that we decided to rent them out as a set and not as individual films. This scheme we started on Tuesday, August 9, just two weeks after the first release. The change was almost miraculous. We booked the three out to one customer who ran them three days successively and now has two return dates. From August 9 on, the set has been booked solid and at this writing is booked up to and including Saturday, September 24, an unusual and unprecedented record.

At every theatre where the three reels have been shown they were played to capacity houses and in each instance were they obliged to turn people away, this notwithstanding the fact that the films had been played for three successive nights. There may have been better and more interesting subjects issued, but as far as an exhibitor is concerned, no title has proven more lucrative than Uncle Tom's Cabin shown as a set.

Furthermore, as an Exchange, we also profited by renting out this title as a set, for first run customers were willing to waive their regular program using the three reels and pay extra, this in addition to their regular service. The results obtained from this scheme certainly were remarkable and surprising, and it only tends to show what the possibilities are in the field, both for the Exchange and Exhibitor, if a little manipulating is done with films.

The conclusion to be drawn from this is self evident; namely, that it does not pay to exhibit a serial feature film in single reels, but they must be shown collectively in order to bring the desired results and attain the end for which they were made. As single reels, a feature of this kind cannot even be classed as mediocre, but, when shown as a set, the feature subject stands out pre-eminent and shows the advantages of the subject worked oue in detail, this as against a crowded one reel feature.

Yours very truly,
THE LAKE SHORE FILM & SUPPLY CO.
E. Mandelbaum, Pres.

August 24, 1910.

In line with the above Manager Shear of the Imported Film Co., New Orleans, La., tells a similar story of the great success scored by the Shubert Theatre in New Orleans, with "The Life of Moses" series, run for a solid week, and, later, the equally great success made at the same theatre with the Uncle Tom's Cabin series, which instance, by the way, was the first "Uncle Tom" show ever given in New Orleans.

These experiences prove that exchanges and exhibitors are learning their lessons.

ESSANAY CONTEST CLOSES.

Hunt for a Name Developes Many Peculiar Philological Specimens.

On Sept. 1, the Essanay Contest, in which it is hoped a new and more fitting name for "moving picture show," "nickelodeon," etc., is to be found, closed and the judges, Mr. George Kleine, Mr. Fred C. Aiken, and Mr. Aaron Jones, received the contributions of the contestants for the Essanay prize of $100 and are now endeavoring to select a winning name. The contest has been a successful one, both in the way of quantity and quality. When the contest closed more than 2,000 names had been contributed, which is proof sufficient that the contest has undoubtedly awakened a great deal of interest, while it is stated by the Essanay's Contest editor the judges will have no trouble in selecting something adequately fitting. In fact, if there should be trouble, it will be merely the regrets of the judges that they may not reward all those contributors whose names it will prove hard to lay aside.

In the selection of the judges the Essanay Company have chosen three men, whose wide information in things concerning motion pictures, and whose impartiality and justice, is ample assurance that the winner of the prize to who will also go the honor of having supplied a name which has really been a long felt necessity will have won through the honest merit of their contributions alone. Mr. George Kleine, president of the Kleine Optical Company, is a veteran in the motion picture field and an authority on all subjects relating to the motion picture industry. Mr. Fred. C. Aiken, manager of the General Film Company, is also well known and highly esteemed by his colleagues and competitors. Mr. Aaron Jones represents one of the foremost of the American exhibiting firms, namely, Jones, Linick & Schafer, of Chicago, proprietors of the Orpheum Theater and a dozen or more others in Chicago and elsewhere. In this selection it will be observed there is a representation of the "triangle" of the industry, namely the manufacturer, or importer, the film exchange, and the exhibitor.

The invitation of the Essanay Company to the exhibitors to inaugurate local contests in conjunction with the Essanay was happily received and as a result the closing week of the contest saw many more contributions from interested patrons of the motion picture theaters all over the United States. The press notices and other advertising suggestions were used by many exhibitors. Many offered small prizes on their own account and appointed the Essanay Company's producers to act as judges in their contests. Many had special posters made, used announcement slides in their theaters and published slips with the terms of the contest which were distributed among the patrons.

Considerable amusement was had in reading some of the suggestions of contributors, some of whom, it is unfortunate, did not clearly understand the contest terms, nor just the kind of name desired. One of the most popular contributions seemed to be the name "Pictorium," of which there were not less than a score contributed. Others were complimentary and flattering in which the name "Essanay" was twisted and turned into "Essanaygraph," "Essanaphone," etc., were used. Some of the words stretched out to lengths that resembled certain Russian "cuss" words. Here are samples of a few of this latter: "Illomelodograph," "Illustrolyricscope," etc., Some, too, are wonders of good slang: "Thrillo," "Wonderine," "Pleasumall," "See-it-now," "Beinstyle," and others. Mr. Warren Kerrigan, the Essanay's leading man, has an admirer in a contributor, who gave "Kerrigan" as his name.

On the other hand there were many contributions received showing that the contestants had spared no little pains and study in obtaining a really dignified, correct and euphonious term. Some took the pains to explain, on their envelopes, why they had selected the names and gave correct definitions. It is from these the judges will find the appropriate name, it is believed.

The Essanay Contest has proven even more successful than was anticipated and speaks well for this enterprising company who truly have the exhibitors' interests at heart. We will await with eager anticipation the announcement of the prize winning word and the name of the winner.

By James S. McQuade

THE manner of releasing feature films of the serial type is a problem that demands careful thought and a correct solution. When the series form a history of the life of some important personage, as, for example, "The Life of Moses," it is not absolutely essential that they should be run in succession as a set; but, where they represent a drama, it is imperative that the entire series should be run during one presentation.

The reasons are obvious; for a life history can be readily subdivided into convenient periods and viewed at different times without impairing the value of the series; whereas, in a drama, the action must be continuous and the plot be revealed without any appreciable break until the denouement is reached. Otherwise interest on the part of the audience, or spectators, is lost and on that interest rests the very life and essence of the drama.

No one ever expects, when he attends the enaction of a play, to see one act to-night, another tomorrow night and the remaining act the night following. And when a drama is enacted in moving pictures, it is positively necessary that the complete production and presentation should be given at the same sitting.

In moving picture dramatic productions, where two or more reels are required, it seems to me that the series should be made a special release, and that all of the reels should be released on the same date.

I have been led to write these few words on this subject by reading a letter received recently by John Rock, Western manager of the Vitagraph Company, and written by E. Mandelbaum of the Lake Shore Film & Supply Co. of Cleveland. Mr. Mandelbaum hits the nail fairly on the head in his discussion of this question. He does not theorize, but simply states facts as they have been ascertained from actual experience. The letter will be found in another column of this issue.

Live Press Work by Princess Theatre, Hammond, Ind.

Manager Reilly of the Princess theatre, Hammond, Ind., never misses an opportunity to let his patrons know well in advance the big things he has to offer in the shape of feature films. The following article was clipped from a recent issue of the "Lake County Times," and it shows how Mr. Reilly takes advantage of the fact that "Lost in the Sudan," Selig's great war spectacle, was taken amid the sand dunes which surround his home city, in order to invest its presentation with a special interest:

FILMS TAKEN ON SAND DUNES NEAR GARY TO BE EXHIBITED SOON.

"Is Gary a land that God forgets? That is the impression that is given by a poster advertising 'Lost in the Sudan,' a moving picture which was taken in the sand dunes near Gary a few months ago and which will be exhibited in the Princess theatre, Hammond, in the near future.

"The poster shows a caravan of British soldiers and a number of natives in costumes carrying heavy loads across the desert. They are supposed to be lost. In the distance the pyramids are shown.

"The pictures were taken by the Selig Co., near Gary. Where Selig found his pyramids is not known. It is known, however, that the company lost a valuable camel which died in a delirium of joy at the idea of being back on his native sands."

GETS BOY CITY PICTURES..

"Manager Reilly has also been fortunate in securing pictures that will be of great interest to local people. He will have the pictures of the Knights Templars' parade in Chicago as soon as they are out.

"It is understood that the Hammond commandery will be shown in this picture. Another picture of interest which will be looked forward to is that of the Boy City, at Charlevoix, in which fifty boys in the Calumet region participated."

Decision on Reno Pictures in Sight.

I have just learned from a reliable source that Judge Brentano of the Superior Court will render his decision on the Jeffries-Johnson pictures Friday, September 2. In the meantime the exhibitors at the Hughes theatre and in Forest Park, outside the city limits, will continue, the attendance thus far being large and the crowds orderly and well satisfied.

A merry wordy war is being waged in the Forest Park village by President Henry J. Mohr, opposing trustees and local reformers, in the midst of which some interesting information is being revealed. Prominent among the statements made by President Mohr is one that a certain minister, whose name he refuses to give, saw the pictures and told Mr. Mohr that if it were not for public sentiment he would exhibit them in his church.

The following excerpt from the Chicago Tribune of Tuesday, August 30, describes the latest tiff between President Mohr and his opponents:

NEAR BLOWS IN FILM FIGHT.

"If you say that again I'll give you a good biff in the jaw."

This threat shouted repeatedly by Village President Henry J. Mohr against John A. Ford, one of the supporters of a petition protesting against displaying the Jeffries-Johnson prizefight films in Forest Park, brought a tumultuous meeting of trustees to an abrupt close last night.

It followed a wordy combat between President Mohr and the Rev. Sidney B. Pinney, pastor of the Pioneer Presbyterian Church, which started through the minister taking exceptions to Mohr laughing over the list of signers and his reference to one of the petitioners as a "sporty chicken fighter" and to another as a "cowardly gun fighter."

Through his various rulings on the different points Mohr succeeded in withholding official action on the petition and a proposed ordinance that was offered until next Monday night.

Petition is Presented.

The petition of protest, signed by 300 residents of the village, was taken to the board meeting by Fred. Schuster, appointed at a recent meeting in the Pioneer church, and was presented through Trustee W. Warnecke, who, with Trustee Herman Rehbein comprised the only official following the church people had.

Immediately upon its presentation Trustee Thomas Cerney voiced bitter opposition, declaring the whites to be "poor sports" for not giving the "nigger a show," and saying there would have been no opposition anywhere if Jeffries had been the victor.

"Oh, come, let's be men and take action and not let Forest Park become the dumping ground of the universe," shouted Warnecke. "Don't wait for the sheriff or the states' attorney to step in." The assemblage began applauding Warnecke's remarks, but Mohr rapped hard with his gavel and shouted: "If that is repeated I will have the hall cleared. I am not opposed to the pictures. Thousands of other moving pictures are a great deal worse. These teach your sons the manly art, and it is better for them than a display of pictures showing how to rob express trains and break open safes. A minister—I won't mention his name—saw those pictures and afterward told me that if it wasn't for public sentiment he would exhibit them in his church.

Cerney put through a motion to refer the ordinance to the committee on public safety, and then Trustee Rehbein pleaded for quick action on the ground that "most of the villagers are opposed to the show."

"I don't believe that," said Mohr, "let the clerk read the signatures, till we see who these petitioners are."

Clerk Fred Samuels read the list.

"Well, one of those men would rather attend a cockfight than eat," continued Mohr, "and another is too cowardly to put up his fists like a man, but prefers to fight with a revolver."

Then the Rev. Mr. Pinney accused Mohr of being unfair, and said the village president cast a reflection on every signer.

"No, I didn't," shouted Mohr.

The minister stepped aside and Ford took up the cudgel, with the result that a rough and ready fight was narrowly averted.

Labor Union vs Picture Libels.

The Chicago "Socialist" of August 29, published the following article under the scare heads "Films Discredit Labor Unions" and "Attempt by Manufacturers to Poison People's Minds Meets Opposition":

"That the manufacturers of the country have decided to make attempts to prejudice the public mind against organizations of labor, is evident in the films that are being used in shows in the large cities everywhere in the United States showing impossible scenes during strikes. One of these films was thrown on the screen of a nickel show last Saturday night in Chicago in view of the Daily Socialist's reporter.

"When called to the attention of labor officials they said that there was no doubt that the pictures were gotten up with the purpose in view of discrediting the unions. Readers who visit shows throwing views of this kind on the screens should voice their disapproval to the manager and call up or drop a postal to the labor departure of the Daily Socialist, giving the name of the film and the theatre showing it."

In the same column appeared a dispatch from Washington, D. C., showing that the following resolution had been introduced and adopted by the Washington Central Labor Union against these picture libels:

"Whereas, For some time past several local moving picture shows have been depicting so-called strikes, blowing up bridges and committing other depredations. These pictures are not only misleading, but have a tendency to prejudice the public's mind against organized labor. Believing that such pictures are inspired by those who would disrupt organized labor; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Central Labor Union go on record as condemning such pictures, and calls on all friends to use such means as are in their power to discourage the exhibition of the same."

I have not as yet been able to learn the name of the theatre in Chicago nor the name of the manufacturer of the film referred to, but it seems to me that this hue and cry is extremely far fetched. In the first place the picture theatre is pre-eminently the theatre of the working man—unionist and non-unionist—and it would be another case of killing the goose that layed the golden egg were film manufacturers to attempt to adopt such a policy.

Speaking of licensed films, I have never, in my experience seen one of the kind referred to; but, even if there were any such licensed films, it would be drawing the bow at a venture to make the charge that manufacturers were attempting to discredit union labor. Every scene of human action that can be thought of is being exploited by the producer of moving pictures, and the competition is so keen that each is trying to outdo the other by selecting a subject that has not yet been used.

What would be more natural, under such con-

"THE TOUT'S REMEMBRANCE"

A Thrilling Essanay Picture

By JAMES S. McQUADE

AT the Essanay factory, when I called last week, I found G. M. Anderson busily engaged on the interiors of several Western feature pictures which will be produced amid the scenic beauties of Wyoming, Montana and Washington in the near future. About the middle of September, Mr. Anderson will go out with the Western company and, in addition, he will take the two worthies, Hank and Lank, along. The short and the long fellow will there engage in Western stunts that are certain to convulse their large following with wholesouled laughter.

As I went out specially to see "The Tout's Remembrance" run off, Superintendent Stice informed me when things were in readiness. This picture is 1,100 feet in length and will be released Saturday, September 24. The story possesses heart interest of the kind that makes one forget everything else. It is similar to that of "Checkers," so long and favorably known to playgoers. The betting ring, the paddock, the stables and the racetrack are all realistically shown, and the various types that frequent such places are well represented.

BULLETS QUARRELS WITH THE COUNTRY SPORT

A unique feature about the production of this picture is that it was made in Old Mexico, California and Chicago. The racetrack scenes were taken at Juarez, Mexico, just across the Rio Grande from El Paso; the country and the grocery store scenes were made at Santa Barbara, and the interior views were completed in the Chicago studio.

As every sporting man knows, Jaurez has one of the finest racetracks in the world, and, as the races were in full blast when Mr. Anderson and his company were down there, these scenes are taken from real life. That they possess all the thrilling interest and atmosphere of the racetrack goes without saying. But, when there is added a gripping story, full of heart interest, it is not to be wondered at that the spectator feels regretful at the close, because of the shortness of this really extra long reel.

"Bullets," as the tout is nicknamed, is impersonated by Mr. Anderson and his sweetheart, the grocer's daughter, is sustained by Miss Ethel Clayton. The acting is clever throughout and the action is brisk and spirited. The photography is excellent and the glimpses of the horses at the Juarez Derby, as they sweep past, gives one a touch of the real thing. Jimmie McIntyre, the well known jockey, is easily recognized among the crowd of horsemen in the paddock, and other celebrities in the equine world are present.

The first glimpse we get of "Bullets" is in the betting ring, where he and a confederate are giving the wrong "dope" to a country sport. The latter loses his money in consequence and puts "Bullets" in his "bad books."

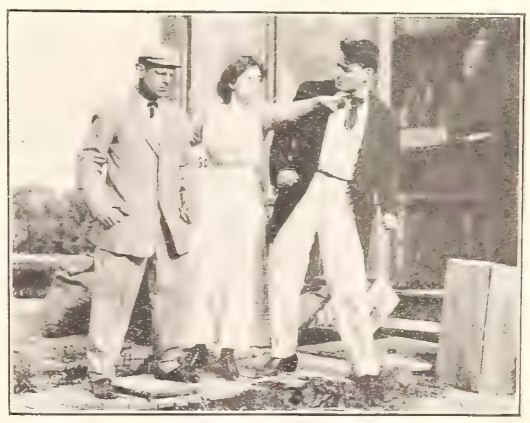
Soon afterwards, the tout receives a letter from his mother, imploring him to give up the racetrack and its associates and to engage in honest work. After a severe mental struggle he resolves to do so, and we see him seeking employment as a grocer's clerk in the country. Here several fine types of rustic loungers are seen and "Bullets" good naturedly tolerates their open-eyed wonder at his city clothes and superior manner.

He succeeds in getting a position, and we find him installed in the grocery and casting sweet looks on the pretty daughter of his employer. But true love never does run smooth, and "Bullets" finds he has a rival in the young country sport whom he swindled on the racetrack. "Bullets" recognizes him the instant he meets him, but the latter fails to remember "Bullets," although certain that he has seen him before.

The young sport proposes to the grocer's daughter, but his suit is declined, and shortly afterwards he discovers the lovers in the act of kissing. He also recollects "Bullets" as the tout who gave him the wrong "tip" and immediately denounces him to the grocer. The latter discharges "Bullets" on the spot, and we see him and his sweetheart in a tender leave-taking. She gives him a twenty-dollar gold piece, which she has worn as a jewel, as a love token.

We again catch sight of him as he stands in front of a large poster which announces the approaching races. At the same instant he is joined by an old associate who has recognized him and who presses him to go back to the old life. But "Bullets' 'is resolute and refuses.

The first day of the races we find him near the track. The owner of a horse, who is listed as a 100 to 1 shot, is seen coming out of the telegraph office. He drops a telegram accidentally and the ex-tout picks it up and reads it. He finds that this horse is a sure winner. Besides, he had received a letter from his sweetheart stating that the grocer had relented, and that his suit would be entertained just as soon as he could return and show that he was the owner of $2,000. The only money in his possession is the double eagle, her love token. He places it on the "long shot" and wins.



THE TOUT LOOKS FOR WORK.

The scene during this race is thrilling, and the face of "Bullets" as he watches the horses come to the winning post is a fine study in the expression of emotion.

"BULLETS" TOUTS THE COUNTRY SPORT.

DETROIT CHURCHMEN TO RUN THEATRE.

Sunday School Men Think Motion Pictures Great Educators—All Pictures Should be Properly Censored.

A motion picture theatre, to be conducted by churches and Sunday-school workers, of Detroit, Mich., is the substance of a plan now being pushed by Harold Trump, superintendent of the First Congregational Church Sunday-school and several other men.

The plan has already received the approval of the Wayne County Sunday-school superintendents' association, and negotiations are now in progress to raise the necessary funds to take over a theatre already established or build a new one.

"The new theatre will be run strictly on business principles and will be just the same as any other theatre, except that we will cut out all of the features which make the ordinary cheap motion picture house a place of menace to young people," said Mr. Trump last week. "We may keep open Sunday and we may not, we may charge five cents and we may charge ten. We will use a good many of the films that the other theatres use, but in addition we will have special films on Biblical and semi-religious subjects. Travel and other educational pictures will play an important part. We may and we may not have vaudeville in connection. The details of the plans are not yet arranged. Most of the money has been raised."

In the meantime Supt. J. Henry Ling, of the Central M. E. Sunday School, is giving motion picture shows for the young people of that church.

The Central M. E. Sunday-school has an enrollment of about 1,500 and is one of the largest in the country. Situated as it is in the heart of the city, it draws its members from the boarding and rooming house element of young folk who are only temporary sojourners in the city and must depend for their social life on the church.

"We realize that the motion picture has assumed an important place in the public life," says Supt. Ling, "and we believe that, properly censored, it can be made a great agency for good and a suitable adjunct to educational church work.

"Our Friday evenings will not be wholly given over to the pictures. We will have other entertainment features. Most of the pictures will be travel scenes and a few of semi-religious nature."

PROMOTER USES PICTURES.

"One of the queerest of uses for motion pictures has come to light through the work of a North Dakota man," says the Norway Advertiser, of Norway, Me. This fellow, who owned several mines in the above state, did not have the capital to make some necessary improvements at his mines. He attempted to get wealthy men to invest in the property, but without success. He decided to go to London for his money, but knew that the English investors were skeptical about putting their money into something they had never seen.

Therefore the mine owner employed a motion picture outfit and films were made showing the work that was going on in the mines. Scenes of the men at work were made, and these were taken to England, where wealthy capitalists became interested. The originator of the idea was enabled to get enough money to make the necessary repairs.

O. T. CRAWFORD TO CONDUCT ANOTHER HOUSE.

The most important deal reported as closed August 23, was one by which the northeast corner of Union Boulevard and Easton avenue, St. Louis, is to be improved with a store and motion picture show building. The sale of the property, which is 100 feet on Easton avenue by 115 feet on Union Boulevard, has been made to the Union-Easton Realty and Building Company, which will make the improvements. The Hagerman-Fitzsimmons Realty Company conducted the negotiations.

A three-story store and office building, containing a hall, covering the third floor, and an artistic vaudeville and motion-picture theater adjoining on the Easton avenue front, will be erected. Work will begin shortly. The theater will be operated by O. T. Crawford as a part of his circuit.

MADE PICTURE SHOW PRACTICAL.

The visit of a laboring man near Beach City, Canton, O., to a motion picture show resulted in saving the life of C. Dorr Johnson, aged 18, son of Mac Johnson, of Beach City. Young Johnson, accompanied by his father, and Glenn Reed, of Beach City, were swimming in Sugar creek when young Johnson was seized with cramps and was sinking.

Reed and the father formed a chain and the drowning boy seized Reed's feet. When brought to the shore he was unconscious. Some men working in a stone quarry were going past just as the unconscious boy was brought to shore. One of the men had seen the pictures of resuscitation of a drowning man and he put what he had seen into practice with the result that young Johnson was soon able to go to his home.

POLI WILL RUN PICTURES.

New England Theatre Manager Can't Get Legitimate Attractions for His Houses.

Owing to the theatrical power of Klaw & Erlanger being practically broken, through its fight with the Independents, Z. P. Poli, the well known manager, who controls a number of large houses throughout the New England states, will have to either run motion pictures and vaudeville or lose a considerable amount of money this coming season. The real cause of this comes from the fact that the trust managers can't supply enough attractions to keep the houses on a paying basis, as they average at least two performances a week.

Last year, by Labor Day, all of Manager Poli's houses were booked for weeks ahead and all through the season the best metropolitan attractions were seen. So far this season "Girlies" is the only play scheduled at Meriden, Conn., which is one of the best theatrical cities in New England.

Now, in order to make the houses a paying proposition, Mr. Poli is getting ready to install motion picture machines and give his patrons the best there is in that line. He realizes that the picture business can be of the best advantage to him, providing the public are given the best.

CRAWFORDSVILLE TO HAVE NEW THEATRE.

J. J. Chakers and Peter Freeman, of Columbus, Ohio, were in Crawfordsville, Ohio, last week, prospecting for a location suitable for the installation of a motion picture show. They were unable to secure the room desired, but will return later, when they expect to conclude negotiations for the opening of a show room on East Main street.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE FOR WEST "PHILA."

West Philadelphia is to have another motion picture and vaudeville theater, which will be erected by Daniel S. Bader, at Forty-ninth and Yocum streets, at a cost of about $15,000. The new structure will be built of brick and stone, one-story high, and will measure 80 by 101 feet. It will have a seating capacity of 1,000, and will be the only place of amusement of its kind in that section of West Philadelphia. It will be completed within a few months. Estimates on its construction are now being received from sub-contractors by the owner. The plans were prepared by the John D. Allen Company, architects.

ALLENTOWN'S NICKELET OPENED AUG. 19.

The Nickelet, one of Allentown's most popular motion picture houses, after undergoing a general overhauling and remodeling of an extensive nature, reopened August 19. The exterior has been repainted in white, cream, gold and light blue. The mirrors adorning the sides at the exterior of the entrance have been lowered and a new ticket office has been built. An appreciative feature, in the exit ante-chamber, especially for the ladies, is a large mirror covering the entire east side wall allowing one a full figure reflection for the adjustment of hats and cloaks.

The entire system of ventilation was changed, with a number of additional electric fans installed, and an adjustment providing for the opening of the skylight at the rear, thus affording ample circulation of air and ventilation.

At the rear a special room has been provided for work on the traps which will make the pictures realistic and as true to life as possible.

A new fireproof operating booth, conforming strictly with the State law, has been erected.

Three reels will be shown at every performance and the pictures will be changed daily. The films are from the Motion Picture Patents Co., and will be the most up-to-date and best the market affords.

The Nickelet is under the direct management of Charles B. Wanamaker, of this city, whose many years of experience in the motion picture line will prove of decided advantage, which fact he has proved to the patrons of the Nickelet right from the start.

WATSONVILLE OPERA HOUSE OPENS AUG. 19.

The opera house picture theatre, Watsonville, Cal., reopened its doors for the season of 1910-1911, August 19. The popular little house was crowded a few minutes after the doors were opened, and there has been a capacity business done ever since.

The pictures that scored the biggest hits at the opening performance were "Love Ye One Another;" "The Way of the Red Man;" "Jinks Has the Shooting Mania," and "What the Daisy Told." On Sunday the afternoon show starts at 3:15 o'clock.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright Applied for.

SYNOPSIS OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 1.—In our last talk we discussed the terms Voltage and Ampere and came to the following conclusion:

Voltage represents the electric pressure on or in an electric circuit the same as pounds per square inch represents the pressure in a water or steam pipe.

Ampere represents the quantity or volume of electricity flowing in or through an electric circuit or apparatus the same as the gallon represents the amount of water flowing in a water pipe.

We also learned that the amperes flowing through the circuit determined the size of wire required.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 2.

OHM.

OHM is the word or electrical term which signifies the unit of resistance offered to the passage or transmission of an electric current on or through an electric wire or conductor.

The legal Ohm is the resistance of a mercury column one square millimeter in cross sectional area and 106 centimeters in length.

The Ohm represents in other words "Resistance" of electric conductors and machines and stands for the same thing as the friction in a pipe carrying water, gas or air.

In every day discussion of electrical matters by the user of electrical machines, the word Ohm is not employed, but the word Resistance being more common and easily understood is generally used.

Under the heading VOLTAGE, we discovered that the voltage at the end of an electric circuit may be considerably lower than the voltage at the point where the current is generated and that the voltage drop was due to the flow of amperes through the circuit, in other words to the friction or resistance offered by the wire to the flow of current. The voltage was used up in pushing the current through the wire just the same as water pressure is used up in pushing water through a pipe. When anything is moved from one point to another there is a loss depending upon the resistance offered. For instance, if you wish to move a 100 lb. weight from one point to another it induces a loss of power or energy depending upon the friction or resistance which, however, can be modified by using different means for reducing or increasing the friction. If the 100 lb. weight is set on a rough board it is difficult to move it because the rubbing of the weight against the board causes friction and the rougher the board the greater the friction and consequent power required to move the weight. This power is lost in the shape of heat, generated on the two rubbing surfaces. If we make the surface hard and smooth less power will be required in moving the weight because the friction and consequently the heat loss is less. If we mount the weight on wheels or ball-bearings, then much less power would be required in effecting the movement because the friction is then reduced to a minimum.

Suppose we have an ordinary canvas sail for a boat and we wish to move the sail from one point to another and the sail is set at right-angle to the direction of the motion, a great deal of power will be required to move the sail. The power depending of course, upon how quickly we affect the movement. If we put the sail lengthwise in line with the movement, it practically offers no resistance at all and it could be moved very easily with a small loss of power.

The foregoing examples serve us very well in getting a clear understanding of resistance due to friction in moving anything from one point to another. Just so is the resistance or friction with consequent loss generating heat in electric wires and machines due to the resistance offered by the wire to the passage of the current depending upon:

(1) The size or diameter of the wire.

(2) The material from which the wire is made.

(3) The amount of current in amperes to be forced through the wire.

We now understand that whenever resistance is introduced heat is generated and power is lost, therefore we should reduce the resistance in all electric circuits and machines to the lowest possible amount in order to save electric energy which costs money to produce.

Copper is the material which for practical purposes offers the least resistance to the passage of electrical currents, therefore copper is used for conducting wires and for all kinds of electrical machines.

If we want to generate heat by means of electricity, then we introduce a wire made of some other material, which offers greater resistance to the passage of electric current as is the case in electric heaters which are made of porcelain, with a wire made of nickel and copper, or nickel and steel, wound upon the porcelain through which the current passes, thus heating the wire.

If we wish to produce light with electricity, then for the incandescent or glow lamp there must be used a wire or conductor of very high resistance which glows yellow or white depending upon the style of the lamp.

If still more brilliant light is required it may be produced by the electric arc between two metal or carbon points. In this case, the resistance is the air space between the two points which is so great that the current ordinarily used for electric lighting cannot jump across even the smallest air gap. In this case, the carbons must be put in actual contact before the "arc" can be started, and then the heat vaporizes the points which forms a gas to take the place of the air which maintains the "arc" and permits the separation of the points forming what is ordinarily called "an arc light."

In order to give you an idea of the comparative resistance of different kinds of materials, I will mention them in the following order from the lowest to the highest: silver, copper, brass, zinc, iron, nickel, carbon, plumbago, moist earth and water.

You may be surprised to learn that if I take a copper rod one half inch in diameter, ten feet long and take glass pipe one-half inch inside diameter, ten feet long, filled with water, the resistance of the water in that pipe is 6,754 million times greater than the resistance of the copper rod.

This may surprise some operators who have been using water for resistance in place of a rheostat, but it is nevertheless a fact that water cannot be used for a rheostat, unless something else like salt, for instance, is put into the water in order to lower its resistance, as otherwise you could not force any current through the water rheostat.

Operators who have used the earth as a resistance by driving pipes into the ground, or by putting metal plates on the bottom of a pond or lake get a current through the moist earth and not through the water, unless the water is salt or is in some other way made a conductor.

There are two kinds of resistance, one due to the friction offered by the conductor, or wire, to the flow of the current which is usually called "Ohmic Resistance."

The other kind of resistance is due to the magnetic kick, or reaction, in an electric circuit or machine and is usually called "Inductive Resistance," and while it is present with direct current systems it is not noticeable unless in special cases, but it is always a big factor when alternating current is used and is taken advantage of in several ways in order to do away with the rheostat for the control of arc lamps, as will be referred to later on.

WATT.

Watt is the word which expresses the unit of electric power. One thousand watts are called one Kilowatt and when one Kilowatt is used for one hour a certain quantity of power has been produced and used which is called one "Kilowatt Hour."

In order to abbreviate the above terms Kilowatt is written and spoken of as K. W. and the kilowatt hour, K. W. H.

The kilowatt hour is the unit or measure by which electric power is made and sold and is used all over the world.

The watt is the product or effect of voltage multiplied by amperes. For instance, if we have a circuit on which there is a voltage of 100 and we operate a moving picture arc lamp on direct current, taking 30 amperes we multiply 100 by 30 which gives us 3,000 watts, which equals 3 Kilowatts, or in abbreviated form 3 K. W. If we burn this arc lamp for one hour there will be consumed 3 Kilowatt Hours, therefore if the rate is 10c. per K. W. H. it would cost just 30c. for one hour.

If we burn this same arc lamp only one half hour it is evident that the watt consumption will be just one half or 500 which equals ½ K. W. H. and the bill for electric current will therefore also be one-half.

Electricity is different from all other powers or forces because it cannot be measured by volume, but only by its effect.

When you buy water from the water company you get pressure as well as a certain number of gallons of water. The pressure may be used for driving a water motor or lifting a piston elevator and besides you have the water after the work has been done.

When you buy electricity from the electric lighting company, you secure and pay for a certain effect which may be represented by power, heat or light, but after you have secured this effect you have nothing left. In other words there is no evidence of you having received anything but the work done on the instant.

In order to give you a practical understanding of what you get when you purchase one kilowatt hour, I may say, that one horse-power as usually applied to a steam engine equals exactly 746 watts, or three-quarters of a K. W. If you operate a one horse-power steam engine for one hour you have used up one horse-power hour, and for an ordinary engine this would require about 10 lbs. of coal.

Now, if you substitute a one horse-power electric motor for the one horse-power steam engine the motor will require about 746 watts, or three-quarter K. W. H. to do the same work, and the expense at the 10c. rate would be just 7½c. for one hour's operation.

I am giving you these examples in order that you may have it impressed upon your mind that electric power is in many respects similar to steam or water power and also to get you familiar with the comparative values of electricity.

Summary.

The Ohm is the unit for measuring resistance in electric circuits and machines.

Resistance is that property in a wire or other material which opposes a movement of any kind and is generally applied to represent the friction in an electric wire and the resistance should be kept as low as possible in order to reduce the heat loss and consequent expense for electric power uselessly wasted.

The Kilowatt Hour is the unit of measurement for electric power, and is the product of the voltage multiplied by the amperes for all direct current systems.

Our next talk will begin with further discussion of the Kilowatt together with standard formulas for electrical calculations in simplified form.

MODERN TICKET CHOPPERS.

A Necessary Device That Will Save Money and May be Ornamental, Too.

Among the many effects that help make the modern theatre front attractive, there is, perhaps, not one that stands out with greater prominence or importance than the modern ticket chopper. Yet how little has been said or done regarding this very useful and conspicuous adjunct to a picture theatre.

Not as a means of ornamentation, but through actual necessity has the ticket chopper become popular with the manager and owner of the motion picture theatre; yet as an ornament it may be made a feature, as well as a saver of money and time.

Taken as a necessity the ticket chopper checks dishonesty among employees; first, by precluding the handling of tickets by ticket takers, as all tickets are dropped into the receptacle by the patrons; second, by thoroughly cancelling all tickets. In this respect it is a real money saver.

As a time saver the ticket chopper enables the doorman to handle crowds with greater facility. That this is true is proved by the fact that choppers are used at all subway and elevated railroad stations where large crowds are handled. Sometimes, too, the ticket chopper and one gateman are used with success where formerly two ticket takers were employed. This is especially true of the new foot-power machine. The chopper is placed between two doors with the gateman sitting or standing directly behind it facing the people as they enter, enabling him to see that all tickets are deposited, to regulate the crowd, and to prevent anyone getting by on either side without dropping a ticket. By means of the foot lever the gateman is allowed free use of his arms.

It is interesting to note in connection with this subject that in their new foot-power machine the Globe Ticket Company of Philadelphia makes ornamentation a strong feature as well as the usefulness. Their chopper stands 47 inches in height and measures 11 inches in width. The base or body of the machine is made, as a rule, of heavy oak, which may, by special arrangement, be enameled to harmonize with the color scheme of any theatre front. Upon the body of the machine rests a handsome receiving device of plate glass and highly polished metal.

Heretofore the objection to a foot-power ticket chopper has been that the cancelling rollers could be operated in only one direction, so that when coins or other hard substances were accidentally dropped into the receiving receptacle the machine was temporarily put out of commission. In the new Globe machine, however, this has been entirely overcome. By the use of an ingenious releasing device the rollers can be reversed instantly, and will drop coins or foreign matter into a canvas bag in a locked compartment in the body of the box.

With so many advantages to be derived from its use, it is difficult to understand why every exhibitor has not installed a ticket chopper. They save time, money and labor. Could one ask more?

"THE BIG SCOOP."—There is nothing more closely connected with the daily life of the American man or woman than the newspaper, and any story which depicts the life of a newspaper man or those incidents of the newspaper world which are not known generally, should be of great public interest.

This film depicts the thrilling dramatic incident in the life of one Jim Connors, a crack reporter of one of the large New York dailies. Connors is immensely popular with all the newspaper fraternity, but unfortunately for him, he is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, which fact often incapacitates him from properly attending to his duties. The night city editor under whom he works is very patient with him at all times, till an infraction of the office rules is the last straw and Jim is summarily discharged by him.

We see Connors' home life. His wife and little girl are very fond of him and it is a sad picture to see the beloved father and husband coming into his home in an intoxicated condition. When Connors tells his wife that he has been discharged, she does not show as much anxiety over that fact as over his condition. The next day Connors comes to his proper senses and at the solicitation of his wife promises to give up drink. Having made this resolution, he calls on the editor and asks to be reinstated. Thinking that this is the old story repeated, the editor refuses to put Jim back to work. Connors appeals to the managing editor—it is useless, as he stands by his subordinate. In a dejected mood, Connors leaves the office. It would be well to mention the fact that this incident is laid at the time of financial uneasiness. Connors strolls down to the business street of New York and in an aimless sort of way reaches the banking section, hoping for some bit of information which might be of such value as to enable him to get a good story and place it with one of the papers. He has a fruitless afternoon and late that night is sitting in a cafe eating a light repast, when he overhears two men, evidently bankers, discussing in an earnest way some startling situation. As they arise to leave the place one of them loses a paper containing a lot of figures, and after their departure Connors picks up the paper. He can make nothing of the figures, but in the hope of something resultnig, follows the men from the cafe and through the banking streets of lower New York until they enter the side door of the Consolidated Trust Company. The door is closed immediately after their entrance and Connors is prevented from seeing into the building by the shade being drawn just as he is about to look through the window. The lateness of the hour and the anxiety of the men make him feel certain that he is hot on the trail of a big scoop. His reporter's instinct makes him positive of it. He therefore determines to get into the bank some way and raps loudly on the window. This brings the night watchman to the scene, who demands to know what he wants. Connors informs him that he has a document which belongs to the gentlemen who have just entered and the watchman brings him into the bank.

In the upper room meanwhile, the directors, the treasurer and the cashier and several officers of the bank are in consultation with the State Examiner, who is examining the standing of the bank and the condition of its affairs with the view of suspending the business. Connors is ushered into this room and the cashier and president of the bank are greatly relieved at finding the figures which they have lost. The excitement attendant upon the discussion of these very figures for the moment makes every one in the room lose sight of Connors. He realizes that his story must be short and thinks quickly. The telephone is on the table near the chair of the bank examiner, and he concludes that this will be a good means of hearing what is going on in the room without being personally present. Quickly cutting the end from a pen holder he inserts it under the hook of the telephone on which hangs the ear trumpet, thereby leaving the phone in operation. Replacing the trumpet which is prevented from closing the connection by reason of the plug which he has inserted, Connors leaves the room. The bank switchboard is at the foot of the stairs on his way out and he requests the watchman to allow him the privilege of telephoning to a friend. This the watchman at first refuses to do, but on Connors being graciously insistent, he consents. As the watchman proceeds on his rounds through the bank proper, Connors hears what is going on in the room above, particularly what is said by the bank examiner and the result is most startling. Fortunately the watchman does not return until he has heard the finish of the bank examiner's assertion that he will close the bank the following morning at ten o'clock. Adjusting the switchboard so that he can call the central office Connors rings up the office of the paper from which he has just been discharged and tells them he has a big scoop and will report to the office. At this juncture the watchman returns and he is forced to hang up the receiver. The message reaches the newspaper office and it causes great excitement, for the reason that it is within twenty minutes of the hour at which the paper must go to press. A great argument is precipitated between the night city editor and Jerry Smith, a close pal of Connors. The night city editor does not wish to stop the paper from going to press at the usual hour and rather belittles Connors' idea of having a scoop. Jerry Smith supports his friend in the matter and the question of whether he will be given time or not is finally decided by the city editor allowing him until a few minutes of one to arrive at the office. We now follow Jim Connors in his effort to get to the reporters' room on time.

Flash scenes between the room and the action of Jim on the street make a very exciting story. Of course, there is no question as to the outcome. Jim wins in the race and secures the big scoop for his paper, or rather for the paper from which he had been discharged, but which becomes his paper by reason of the fact that the night city editor and the managing editor are both present when he breathlessly announced the news which their paper only, will cast abroad at the early hours of the morning.

Jim goes to his home and to the fond little wife who has been waiting all these hours for him. His long delay has made her worry and fear that perhaps Jim has fallen from grace. She has given way to sleep and her head is reclining on her arm on the table when Jim enters the room. She is at first startled from her sleep, but the glad tidings which he gives her bring her to a full realization of the fact that her husband has "made good" in more ways than one.

Old as is the embrace at the end of a moving picture, there is in the one here shown a thrill which is felt in but few. From every standpoint this is a superb film. The story is not only dramatic, but it is human. The acting is perfect and the scenic qualities as well as the photographic ones are splendid. The actual banking district of New York is shown in the picture and the detail work of the night city editor's room of the great New York daily is presented with the strictest view to accuracy in every detail. Another great Edison film.

"ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND."—The title of this picture thrown on the screen will recall to the memory of thousands upon thousands all over the world, visions of the Alice they knew in the days before they became "grown-ups." Many of her adventures and of the queer little people she met will come back to the mind and will eagerly be looked for in the film itself. To those who have never read the story of "Alice's Adventures" the picture should make an appeal as one of the most attractive American productions on this order. It is full of surprises and interesting photographic illusions which serve to illuminate the story of adventures. Alice is played by a real little girl who has long loved the book "Alice," and who will be recognized by many patrons of the motion picture theaters as one of the cleverest of our child players.

The story begins, as in the book, where Alice and her big sister are sitting on the side of a hill overlooking the lake, the big sister busy with her book. Before long we see the little girl's eyes grow heavy and she finally begins to see things, the first being the rabbit, Alice's friend and guide in her travels. We see him take a watch out of his waistcoat pocket, look at it and then hurry on. Alice starts to her feet, as it evidently flashes through her mind that she has never before seen a rabbit with either a waistcoat pocket or a watch to take out of it, and burning with curiosity she runs across the fields after it just in time to see it pop down a large rabbit hole under the hedge. In another minute Alice goes in after it, never once considering how in the world she can get out again. Then the scene shifts and we see her falling down the rabbit hole. Either it is very deep or she falls very slowly, for she has plenty of time to look about her as she falls down, down, down. She wonders how many miles she has fallen and thinks she must be getting somewhere near the center of the earth. Then suddenly she falls into the mysterious hall with doors all around it. The doors are all locked and when Alice goes all the way down one side and up the other trying every door, she realizes that she cannot get out of the hall. Suddenly then she comes upon the little three-legged grass table with nothing on it but a tiny key. She tries the key in all the doors of the hall, but, alas, either that there are no locks on the doors, or they are too small or too large. Then she notices a little door about fifteen inches high at the bottom of one of the big ones, tries the little golden key, and to her great delight it fits it. She opens the door, looks out along the passage into the loveliest little garden that ever was. She longs to get out of the dark hall, to wander among those beds of bright flowers and cool fountains, but she cannot even get her head through the doorway. Closing the door, we see her return to the table, and lay the key on it. And then she discovers a mysterious bottle which bears the words "Drink Me." When she has taken a drink from the bottle she finds herself growing smaller and smaller, shutting up like a telescope. When she is ten inches high she can go through the little door, but now the key is high above her head on the table. The effect of Alice's change in size is very happily carried out and conveys the illusion perfectly. Next we see her eat the wonderful cake which makes her grow tall enough so that she can get the key again. But then she does not stop growing, but keeps on until she fills the entire hall and begins to cry with grief at her inability to stop. She cries a whole pool of tears and incontinently tumbles into it. We see her splashing about and then crawling out of the pool as dry as if water were not wet at all. Then the rabbit reappears, very tiny compared to Alice now and passes her, disappearing down the end of the hall. He leaves a little fan behind him, which Alice picks up and which has the same effect as the wonderful liquid in the bottle. She begins to grow small again and finally is able to pass through the little door into the beautiful garden.

Then follows the scene with the enormous puppy who looks down at her with large, round eyes and seems to try to play with. She is so tiny beside the puppy that he looks like an elephant. She takes up a stick to play with him and is almost sorry when he runs away and leaves her. She should have liked teaching him tricks very much, if she had only been the right size to do it.

Then she wanders on until she comes upon a little house about four feet high and while she stands looking at it and wondering what to do next, suddenly a footman in livery comes out of the woods. She considers him a footman because he is in livery, otherwise, judging from his face, she would call him a fish. He raps loudly at the door, which is opened by another footman in livery with a round face and large eyes like a frog, and both footmen bow ceremoniously. The fish footman begins by producing from under his arm a great letter, an invitation from the Queen to the Duchess, after delivering which both footmen bow low and the fish man disappears, while the other sits down on the ground near the door staring stupidly into the sky. At this moment the door of the house opens and a large plate comes skimming out straight at the footman's head. It just grazes his nose, breaks to pieces against one of the trees behind him. It is followed by several others which narrowly miss him, and Alice decides that she must go into the house and find out what it's all about. The little door leads right into a large kitchen full of smoke from one end to the other. The Duchess sits on a three-legged stool nursing the baby. The cook is leaning over the fire stirring the large cauldron which seems to be full of soup, and there certainly seems to be too much pepper in the soup, for they all sneeze as the cook flourishes the pepper pot. In fact, the only people in the room that don't sneeze are the cook and the large cat which is sitting on the hearth grinning from ear to ear. It is Alice's first meeting with the Cheshire cat. Then suddenly the cooks sets to work throwing everything within her reach at the Duchess and the baby; fire-irons, dishes, sauce pans and plates. The Duchess takes no notice of them, even when they hit her and the baby howls so much that it is impossible to say whether the blows hurt it or not. Then the Duchess gets up, throws the baby to Alice and disappears. Then we see Alice carry the baby out into the woods and suddenly realizing that some change has come over it, she looks down—it is neither more nor less than a pig. She feels that it would be quite absurd for her to carry it any farther, so she sets the little creature down and is quite relieved to see it trot away quietly into the woods. It has hardly disappeared from the scene when the Cheshire cat dimly appears upon the limb of a tree and smiles down at Alice. While Alice is talking to it, it disappears and reappears again, which is very disconcerting to her.

In the next scene Alice has come to the house of the March Hare. There is a table set out under the tree and the March Hare and the Hatter are having tea at it, a dormouse sitting between them fast asleep. The other two, using it as a cushion, resting their elbows on it and talking over his head. The table is a large one, but the three are all crowded together in one corner and they indicate that there is no room for Alice, but she indignantly tells them that there is room and sits down in a large armchair at one end of the table. It certainly is a sad tea party, for they drop everything into the teapot and we see the Hatter take out his watch and look at it uneasily, shaking it now and then and holding it to his ear. Then we see him put butter in the works and indicate, when Alice protests, that it is the best butter obtainable. As this fails to make the watch go, he dips it into his cup of tea and finally ends by putting it in the tea pot. This is too much for Alice and she beats a retreat. The last she sees of the three, the March Hare and the Hatter are putting the Dormouse into the tea pot after the watch.

Then comes the garden of roses and the croquet grounds of the King and Queen of Hearts, where we are introduced to their majesties and to the Knave with the family of heart children.

This scene is followed by a banquet at which the dastardly Knave steals the tarts and gets away with them, as told in the familiar rhyme. Although Alice is the only one to see him, she refuses to tell even when summoned to the trial, which takes place in the next scene.

The first witness is the mad Hatter, who nervously bites a piece out of his tea cup when called upon to testify and takes off his shoes instead of his hat in respect to their majesties. The cook with her pepper box is another witness and makes them sneeze, but refuses to give any valuable evidence. Then comes Alice, the last witness, who angers their majesties by her refusal to convict the Knave, and who protests at the idea of sentencing him without going through the formality of finishing the trial. She braves the angry Queen, who can plainly be seen ordering Alice's head cut off. Then, as in the book, Alice indicates that she doesn't care for them, that she knows that they are nothing but a pack of cards, at which sign, the whole pack rises into the air, the people changing to real cards and come flying down upon her and about her head. She tries to beat them off and in so doing wakes herself up and finds herself again upon the hill side with the big sister gently brushing away the dead leaves that have fluttered down on to her face.

The picture is full of the spirit of childhood and yet attractive enough and novel enough to interest the older people. It will probably result in many of the latter going home and re-reading the story which Lewis Carroll wrote so long ago.

The Edison Company counts the film an achievement and expects a hearty welcome for it everywhere. Photographically it is artistic and beautiful enough to be a delight to everyone, young or old.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

"A DOG ON BUSINESS."—"Weary" William, who is hungry and obsessed with a desire to make some easy money, hits upon a really excellent idea. The inspiration comes when he finds a stray pup, which appears to be in about the same fix as he—hungry and homeless.

"Weary" appropriates the dog and plans his campaign. He finds that he needs more dogs, a bunch of dog collars and a sign. After he has corralled a score or more of canines with collars, each bearing the name "Rover," he gets busy with a sign which reads to the effect: "$100 reward for the return of my pet dog, bearing collar with the name 'Rover.' Mrs. Dogonyou, 22 Stung street." The sign is posted, and "Weary" lingers close by to await developments.

Things start immediately. A copper wanders by and reads the sign with interest. The hobo, unfearful hurries back to his corral, selects a canine, and hurries back to the copper's beat. The limb of the law is easily roped in, pays five dollars for the dog, and hurries off to claim the reward.

"Weary" repeats his little game with a dozen or more pedestrians, among whom are a bevy of pretty girls, a baker, banker, a sport with a tennis racquet, and a wandering Jew. When he has sold out, he resolves to go around to 22 Stung street, and watch the fun.

It is not long before the crowd arrives, scores of them, each dragging a pup and each confident of receiving the reward.

Imagine the crowd's dismay when they find that 22 is the number of an empty house!

The finish of the film is fast and furious, when the hungry bull pup, purchased by the Jew, catches him by the seat of the trousers and refuses to let go.

"AN INDIAN GIRL'S AWAKENING."—Silver Bell, the winsome daughter of old Gray Wolf, is sought by Fleetfoot, a likely young man of the tribe and a good huntsman. Gray Wolf sees no reason why his obstinate daughter should not become the squaw of Fleetfoot, and despite her pleadings to be permitted to stay in her father's tepee, she is sold to Fleetfoot for the consideration of Tu-tu, the horse, and a red blanket.

Silver Bell unwillingly accompanies Fleetfoot on their way through the woods to the tepee of the young brave. On their way they meet a white man, Jack Sherwood, a miner, and to this latter Silver Bell appeals for protection from the angry fists of her new lord and master.

Sherwood listens hesitatingly and learns that the girl was sold against her will and that she would rather die than live with Fleetfoot. In the end he forces Fleetfoot to come with him to Gray Wolf's tepee, and with an offer of much wampum persuades Gray Wolf to reconsider his sale, and in the end Sherwood finds himself the owner of the pretty Indian maiden.

The buck stumbles away with Tu-tu and his red blanket, murmuring threats against the white man who, much to the wonder of Gray Wolf and his daughter, refuses to take the girl with him.

It is plainly evident that Silver Bell has fallen in love with her protector, and the next day she slips through the woods to the miner's tent and presents him with a pair of pretty moccasins. Sherwood is delighted, but when the girl informs him that as she is now his she will be content to stay with him as his servant.

LAST WEEK Mr. Conover, Manager Keith's Nickel Theatre in Montreal, told you how his "HALLBERG" Electric Economizer has been in operation two years, seven days a week, fourteen hours a day. Do you know what that represents in dollars and cents to him? IT means that, with a rheostat, he would have used in that time over 51,100 kilowatt hours, which, at the 10 cent rate for current, is $5110 worth of electricity for his M. P. lamp—but he used a "HALLBERG" Economizer, cutting down the current consumption to only 20,440 kilowatt hours, saving 30,660 kilowatt hours, or $3066 in money, in two years.

s - Gentlemen, these are cold facts, proven by figures—and figures don't lie. Come, let us get together. I can wave you money, and give you a 50 per cent. better light in the bargain. If you already have a current saver, I make a liberal allowance for it in trade for a "HALLBERG" Economizer.

Besides, the wonderful "HALLBERG" Economizer, I make 4000 Candle Power Flaming Arc Lamps, and Economizers for incandescent lighting, and sell all high grade moving picture machines, opera chairs, lenses and all kinds of supplies. Send $1.50 for a set of "HALLBERG" Terminal Connectors. They stop burning out of lamp leads, and my "Spec-Oil" at 35c. a can by mail, postpaid, saves 25 per cent. on the wear of your machine and over one-half on oil bill.

This is a pretty situation for Sherwood, but not fully realizing the real depth of the girl's infatuation for him, he sends her back to her father's tepee. On the way she meets Fleetfoot and an angry altercation takes place, in which the brave tells her that he will kill the white man.

The girl, fearing for the white man's life, hurries back through the woods and arrives at Sherwood's tent just as the buck is preparing to make short work of the miner. Silver Bell's scream awakens the white man and he and the Indian are soon grappling. The former proves the stronger, and wresting the knife from Fleetfoot's hand he hurls it away.

Fleetfoot sneaks away, leaving Sherwood and the Indian girl together. Sherwood expresses his gratefulness and Silver Bell confesses her love.

It is more difficult this time to drive her away, but when she is gone the rattling of the stage coach down the canyon suggests a return to civilization.

Sherwood is packing his camp outfit when the coach lumbers up and stops at the camp. Sherwood runs forward, when his wife steps out and throws her arms about his neck. This is a surprise for Sherwood, but not more for Silver Bell, who has returned to the camp with another present for the white man, a pretty red blanket of her own weaving. She understands what it means, and as the coach rolls away sinks on her knees and bursts into tears.

"THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR IS HARD."—A confidential secretary, hard pressed for personal funds, overpowers a bank messenger and obtains a goodly sum. The messenger is hidden in an office-chest. In the course of their search detectives call upon the guilty man at his home. They come, however, for information only. Now, however, he becomes so frightened that he betrays himself to his wife. She, broken in spirit, confides in the family and requests their aid. A brief consultation proves there is no opportunity whatever of proving the husband innocent. His old father, though heartbroken because of his boy's crime, would still aid him to avoid the legal consequence by supplying him with a revolver, trusting him to make his own punishment. Now, while the guilty man's little daughter prays for him the family in fearful agony await the end, the partial vindication of their name. Struggle as he will with himself, he cannot bring his courage to the sticking point. His cowardly agonies are awful to look upon. A powerful warning to every man who sees the film. When his fear has conquered and he is about to flee the police arrive and he is forced to leave his sorrowed family.

"ROBERT, THE DEVIL," OR "THE FINAL VICTORY OF RIGHT."—Because of the appearance of a strange demon in the sky, the Duke of Normandy is banished for helping a condemned man. The condemned man proves to be Satan in disguise. The news arrives at the castle, where Robert's servants flee from him. Driven from the country, the Duke is forced to leave his estates.

Although Robert has lost his weapons by gambling he accepts a challenge to fight for the honor of a dumb princess. His Squire borrows the sword of the Duke of Cerus. This squire Satan uses all his influence to make trouble for Robert.

After a short contest Robert wins the encounter, but Cerus wins the credit, using as proof the armor and sword which Robert used. Acting on the advice of a necromancer Robert braves a host of wicked spirits and obtains the healing flower. The Princess, now able to speak, announces her champion.

"INGRATITUDE," or "THE JUSTICE OF PROVIDENCE."—A fairly wealthy farmer foolishly gives all his effects to his son on the condition that a comfortable living be given him until his death.

Six months later the son has proven untrue to his trust and developed a fierce cruelty toward his kind but unwise father.

But for his sweet-natured grandson, the old man would often suffer for the barest necessities of life. The two become great companions.

The revolutionists, incited by a rowdy leader, organize to rob the Royalists of the neighborhood. Word of their progress soon covers the country side.

A local lord of great wealth hears of their approach and attempts to hide his treasure box, but is frightened into flight before he finishes his task.

After an exciting chase along the highroad, across fields and through deep forests, he is forced through fatigue to stay his flight.

Seeing capture is inevitable he throws the box of jewels into the bushes.

Here they are discovered by the old farmer's grandson and given to the abused old man.

Now the revolutionists find excuse to drive the ungrateful man from his home and burn it to the ground.

In this scene the old man forgets the past and gives his aid to his son who has so ill-treated him.

"MILITARY KITE-FLYING AT RHEIMES."—Showing in detail the extending of the planes by use of jointed frames. For transportation the kites are folded into a very small space.

Even before a kite's sections are entirely joined it begins to tug heavily upon the ropes.

After several powerful kites have been sent into the air upon one line a car is attached, carrying in some cases several men.

A close view of the large reel which carries the kite line. Two strong men are required to handle this.

We now follow the kites and cars about and among the clouds for a little time.

Which is accomplished easily and impressed us with the utility of three large toys in the hand of grown men.

"MAMA'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT."—The Kalem Company offers a domestic comedy that will appeal with great force to newly weds the country over. The scene is supposed to be laid in a typical New York suburb, a section more or less infested by tramps. Mrs. Newlywed is a nervous and excitable woman, is always worried when Mr. Newlywed is away from home and when her birthday aproaches an opportunity occurs to her husband to buy a watch dog. He acquires possession of this dog in a very amusing way, has all sorts of trouble in getting it home, more trouble in getting it into the house without being seen and finally succeeds in hiding it in a small closet under the stairs preparatory to the presentation on the following day. A couple of Mrs. Newlywed's former girl friends happens in to help out in the celebration and the cook promptly quits. To make matters worse Mr. Newlywed has a telegraphic summons calling him to the city and in his rush to get away he forgets all about the dog in the closet and when night comes on and the three women have retired there is a sudden alarm. Noises are heard like those made by a burglar trying to force open the door. Of course, it is the dog trying to scratch his way out of the closet and from titme to time the pictures flash to the interior of the closet showing the dog trying to scratch his way out of under the door. Naturally the women are in a frenzy of fear, but manage to pluck up suffificent courage to come down to the telephone and call up the police. They soon arrive and after a great ado round up the supposed burglar just as a telegram comes in from hubby telling Mama about her birthday present.

The working out of this plot furnishes unlimited opportunities for fun making and mirth runs riot through the film from start to finish.

"THE COW PUNCHER'S SWEETHEART."—The Kalem Company's Indian picture for Friday, September 9th, is called "The Cow Puncher's Sweetheart" and as the title indicates there is more of the cow boy than there is of the Indian. The title part of the "Cow Puncher's Sweetheart" is played by Miss Gene Gauntier, the popular heroine of the Kalem "Girl Spy" series and in this picture she gives the finest exhibition yet of dare devil horsemanship. The cow puncher of the story is a splendid type of the young Western ranchman who has incurred the enmity of a renegade Indian horse thief by running him down and bringing him to justice. The Indian, full of revenge, attempts to strike at the cow boy through his sweetheart, and the girl is captured and taken into the Indian camp. The cow punchers get word of it, however, and there is a horseback chase which will delight all lovers of fine horse flesh. It is useless to say that the cow puncher's sweetheart is saved and that the Indians get their deserved punishment.

The feature of this picture is the magnificent riding and the beautiful Western horses. The photography is exceptionally brilliant.

"THE HEALING FAITH."—Harold King is a clerk in the Export Bank, and Evelyn Morse is a frequent visitor to her father, the president of the institution. Harold loves her and to his delight finds his love returned, though her ambitious father has other plans for his beautiful daughter. Harold is dismissed from the employ of the bank and, to add to his misfortune, he is told that he suffers from tuberculosis. He writes to Evelyn that he cannot hold her to her promise, but the girl has much of her father's spirit; the advantage of the open-air treatment is made plain to her and she persuades Harold to marry her. He does not want to, but disease has weakened his will for the time being and he bows to her dominant individuality. Evelyn hurries him off to a sanitarium and obtains employment, skimping and saving for the man she loves since the banker has disowned her for marrying against his wishes. Harold rapidly regains his strength and presently is discharged from the sanitarium as completely cured. Meanwhile Evelyn has lost her place in the factory where she was permitted to earn the pittance that brought health to her husband, and she is about to be evicted as Harold appears upon the scene to become the head of his household.

"MATILDA'S WINNING WAYS."—"Bach" Skinner is a regular lady killer, according to his own belief, but his five feet of fascination are not appreciated by the women he seeks to impress, and some of them handle the runty little "masher" with no gentle force. "Bach" finally centers his affections upon Sally Handell, who teaches the kindergarten class. "Bach" intrudes upon the teacher in the class room only to be thrown out by the janitor, but the opposition merely makes him the more determined and he hits upon the plan of disguising himself as a child—an easy matter with his few inches—and having his housekeeper take him to the school. The scheme works well for a while, but Sally is engaged to be married and her sweetheart comes to take her to the minister, bringing with him the superannuated and attenuated relief teacher. The new teacher does not appeal to "Bach's" fancy, and when she announces that she wants to kiss all the little boys and girls "Bach" decides upon an impromptu graduation. The teacher reaches for him and in the struggle his wig comes off. That's enough for the teacher and she runs after him, the chase ending in the water, where the teacher rescues him and drags him off to the minister. Sally and Jack have just been made man and wife and in their new found happiness they agree with teacher that, having saved "Bach's" life, she is entitled to it. "Bach" resigns himself to the inevitable, but they do not live happy ever after.

"BASEBALL, THAT'S ALL!"—He's a regular "fan" and studies the baseball news as carefully as some people do their Bibles. He comes to breakfast with his dear little wife and finds his morning paper as usual at his plate. "By Jobe!" he shouts, as he glances at the news, "a game this afternoon." Then he begins to wax eloquent about the strikes, flies, home runs and base hits, putting his hand in the hominy, knocking the coffee pot from the table and winding up his exposition by pulling the table-cloth off and everything else with it. He has gone the limit and wifey can humor his craze no longer. She swoops down upon him with an umbrella and gets in some "swats" that nearly knock the cover from his dome. He makes a run for the office with a deep laid plan to go to the ball game by pretending he has a toothache. The plan succeeds and he starts for the grounds. Just after he has worked the toothache excuse, the boss picks up the newspaper and the first thing he strikes is the baseball announcement. "Ah," says the boss, "it's me for the ball park," and off he goes to see the sport.

After a few liquid applications to his tooth, the clerk is on his way. Passing a newspaper office he sees the baseball scores of the previous day and begins to air his views as to the merits of the different teams, gets into a scrap, and is "taken in." He tells the Judge how the row began and his love for the National game. The judge discharges him and in considering the matter decides to take in the game himself.

At the ball game we are right into the spirit of it and we are rooting just as hard as any of the fans, excepting the young clerk, who makes himself such a nuisance he is told to sit down, shut up, hire a hall and do several other things. A slide for home is made by one of the players and "clerky" loses all control of himself, waves his hat, falls over on the judge and his boss, who has not recognized him until now. The old man fires him from his employ and the judge threatens to arrest him.

All in, hat busted, clothes torn and hair dishevelled, the young enthusiast gets home and crawls into bed. Sleep cannot subdue his ardor. In his dreams he raves, roots and rants about the boys at the bat. Not until his wife enters the room and empties a pitcher of water on him does he wake and his fever cool. Then, and not until then, does he reckon the cost of one day's game of baseball. With an aching brow and conscience he vows "never again," falling into the arms of his forgiving wifey.

"WHO IS BOSS."—When Mr. Younghusband was married he made up his mind that, come what might, he would be the boss in his home. When his wife received a short note from her mother announcing her intention of calling upon them for lunch that day, Mr. Younghusband saw the time was coming when he would have to set his foot down. The esteemed lady duly arrived, but during lunch an angry discussion took place, and Mr. Younghusband then began to show that he was the boss. He threw dinner and furniture out of the window and made his mother-in-law leave the house, as she did not seem amenable to reason. He was then able to recline in his chair with his hands in his pockets and say: "I am the Boss."

"ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS IN ANTWERP."—The Antwerp Zoo covers a fair extent of ground, and is generally considered an important one. A large number of views of birds and animals have been taken. The monkey house has also come in for much attention, and various comic incidents add a touch of whimsicality.

"THE GAMBLER'S WIFE."—John Darrell had a comfortable home and a charming wife, but was unable to conquer his insatiable desire for gambling. One night, when he and his wife are entertaining three other gentlemen at dinner, a game of cards is proposed and at the earnest solicitation of his wife he promises to play but a short while. Unfortunately, he does not keep his promise, but continues to play, and the longer he plays the larger his losses become, until he has lost everything to his pseudo friend, Hubert Dickman. Finally, as a last resort, to recoup, and against the wishes of his wife, who endeavors to restrain him, he stakes his home against the money he has already lost. Needless to say, he loses. In despair he retires to his room to think things over, and, reading a letter from his wealthy uncle in which he refuses to help him until he has conquered his passion for gambling, the idea comes to him to rob his uncle. Preparing, he sets out suitable clothes and gets out his gun, and then, lying on the sofa, falls asleep. But bad dreams come to him—he sees himself arise, disguise himself and enter his uncle's house by the window. He then sees himself taking the money from his uncle's bureau, and being disturbed, shoots and wounds the old man, but he himself is shot and captured. There is then mutual recognition by uncle and nephew—but at this moment he rolls off the sofa horrified, and unable at first to believe that it was only a dream. Meantime Dickman has told Mrs. Darrell that he has won the home, and she, who never plays, determines that she must make an effort to regain the fortune her husband has so recklessly discarded. Staking her jewels against some of the money, she wins, and finally secures, not only all that her husband had lost, but all the ready money that Dickman had on him. Having accomplished her purpose she bids the footman show him out and returns to her husband to tell him of the altered state of affairs. He would fall upon her neck and smother her with kisses, but she tells him that he cannot kiss her until he swears to cease playing for evermore. After a moment's hesitation, he takes the required oath, destroys the cards and embraces his wife, feeling sure that he will stick to his promise after the dreadful lesson his dream had given to him.

"THE BELGIAN ARMY."—Military service in Belgium is compulsory, although part only of the term of service is spent with the colors. Actually the army numbers some 48,000 men, although, with the addition of the reservists, 160,000 men could be taken into the field. Antwerp, where are situated the principal barracks, affords, with its semi-circle of forts and large open spaces on the right bank of the Scheldt, facilities for maneuvers and military training. The Belgian soldier is fairly well set up, is not altogether unenthusiastic regarding his occupation, and, on the whole, the little kingdom's army compares favorably with others of small countries.

"LUCY AT BOARDING-SCHOOL."—Maisie is foremost amongst the girls at the boarding-school in exchanging jest and puns over the wall with a number of young boys, one of whom gives her a packet of cigarettes and teaches her to smoke. Maisie is an apt pupil, and, delighted with the soothing influence of her cigarette, she slips away to offer up incense to my Lady Nicotine in peace and quietness. She smokes like a chimney and a suspicious whiff betrays her whereabouts and her wrongdoing to the headmistress. Maisie then retreats into a cellar room, pulling the door to and holding it fast; but, unawares, she catches her dress in the door and it is cut by the headmistress as a means of detecting the culprit later on. Her pupil's first feeling of dismay upon discovering what has happened is quickly followed by the conviction that she must render the evidence against her useless by a politic counter-stroke, and she accordingly cuts a piece out of the dress of each of her school-fellows after bedtime. Unluckily, she has omitted to notice that her underskirt has also been damaged, and this betrays her on the following day, when she is rigorously punished.

"THE APPEAL OF THE PRAIRIE."—John Henderson, prospecting in the far west, is lost on the plains without food or water. Luckily, Lonefox, the young son of the Sioux chief, while riding, finds him and drags him delirious to his father's camp, where attention and care are bestowed on him and he recovers. Before going on his way Henderson gives Lonefox a valuable ring for having saved his life. Fourteen years elapse, and Lonefox has graduated at the Spendex Indian college, while Henderson, having met with great success in life, is now president of a bank in the East. Lonefox, on the strength of a recommendation from the college, obtains a position in the bank, but one day, Charles Holstein, to be avenged on Lonefox, who has refused to be a party to certain villainous schemes, places a roll of notes in his pocket. The money is soon missed and Lonefox is denounced as the culprit. Pleading his innocence to Henderson, the latter notices the ring on the Indian's finger and mutual recognitions follow, with the result that Lonefox is acquitted of the crime and taken by Henderson to his home and introduced to his wife and daughter as the man who had saved his life years ago. At a lawn party Lonefox excels in archery, but is mocked for being an Indian by Holstein, who is a suitor for the hand of the daughter. Lonefox is also in love with Elsie, who, when he proposes to her, refers him to her father, knowing full well that he will not permit her to marry an Indian. This, together with the sight of Elsie and

"LED BY LITTLE HANDS."—John Flint, a stern old man, whose life is wrapped up in his beautiful daughter Nellie, has become obvious to any reason other than that she should marry the man of his choosing. A determination that has oft times proven useless interference in love affairs. Nellie loved Dick Summers, and he in return was happy in the thought of her affection. The day was set and Nellie's dimpled finger bore the little band of gold. The father, indignant at the sudden change of affairs, turns them from his door.

Nine years later we see Dick and Nellie in their modest little home, heaven has blessed them with two devoted children. The smouldering embers of paternal love still gives its light in Nellie's heart and she longs for his love and forgiveness. The children in playful prattle seem to realize the situation, and steal out quietly, bent on finding grandpa.

They do so and come upon him in the garden and after some questions are recognized as his grandchildren. It has been so long since his sturdy heart had been soothed with words of kindness, and John Flint saw a new world open to him; rays of sunshine seemed to nestle here and there.

The children stayed for dinner, little thinking in their childish glee that their parents were almost distracted at their absence. Nellie, finding the boy's cap outside the garden gate, feels a relief and ventures in. It is then her eyes for the first time in nine years rest upon her father, but the indurating process has met its Waterloo; the once stony hearted John Flint was humble and craved the love of his girl. He takes her to his heart and home.

The ever prevailing influence of the inner man predominates and ends happily the little romance that found its beginning in blighted ambitions. A picture so real and true to life, so pure in motive and upbuilding in its moral theme cannot but rank well among the season's successes.

"JIM THE RANCHMAN."—Jim Brandon received a wire stating he is to come West and take charge of the ranch. The change does not altogether please him, but being a man willing at all times, and able to rise to the occasion, he starts for his new work. Arriving there he looks the ground over carefully.

Discontent among the employees marks the advent of the new manager, who, with his Eastern ideas, finds himself facing a problem that is not to be solved without drastic measures. The foreman of the ranch had long since paid marked attention to Bernice, and with the turn of affairs, has hastened his suit, but she has seen in the newcomer more of her ideal, and accordingly rejects her suitor.

This brings things to a chaotic state, and the foreman resigns and the hands all go on strike. This brings Brandon's blood to the boiling point, and he clears for action, and declares himself in no mild terms.

Employee after employee is leaving the ranch. Something must be done to curb the stampede. Accordingly Jim sets a pace of things on the big ranch that puts in awe anything they had anticipated from the big Easterner, and suffice to say, carried his point admirably.

As usual, after the storm comes the calm, and in this case the justice was summoned, the knot tied, and the big ranch was again itself. An interesting story put in picture form by the Inimitable Selig, in his superior way.

"CHEW-CHEW LAND."—Two children, Dolly and Jim, are schoolmates. Jim is a manly little chap. One of the boys puts a wad of chewing gum on the teacher's chair. Jim takes a package of chewing gum from his pocket, puts a piece in his mouth, and gives a stick of it to Dolly, who is chewing busily when the teacher sits down on the chair and the gum. All the youngsters begin to titter; the teacher discovers the cause and accuses Dolly of placing the gum on the seat. Dolly denies it, but the "schoolmarm" doesn't believe her. Jim comes forward and says he did it; taking the blame and relieving Dolly from suspicion. Jim is kept in after school, and when he is allowed to go home he meets Dolly outside waiting for him with a bouquet of flowers, which she gives him and commends him for his bravery.

Jim, our little hero, tired out by the duties and play of the day, is getting ready for bed. Placing Dolly's bouquet in a glass on a table, sticking his chewing gum on the bedpost, he gets under the covers and goes to sleep.

During his slumbers "Wriggles," a mischievous imp, gets him to visit "Chew-Chew Land." They jump out of the bedroom window to the garden below, where they meet Dolly. Wriggles touches the ground with his magic wand; it opens and down into the opening the three explorers disappear from sight and drop right-side-up into "Chew-Chew Land," where they are introduced to its mysteries and many wonders, filling them with astonishment and glee. One thing after another appears to awaken their surprise, one thing funnier and more amazing than the other. Jim is puzzled and is just asking himself "How can all these things be?" when he wakes up and realizes that it is all a dream. His mother comes into his room and Jim tells her all about his dream while she is helping him dress, and together they are enjoying all the wonders of "Chew-Chew Land" as they have been revealed to Jim.

"A ROUGH WEATHER COURTSHIP."—The gangplank has been drawn back and the steamer is under way; the passengers are all on deck, among whom is a gay and attractive widow. Her fellow passengers of the male gender are casting furtive and loving glances at her. After some sparring they manage one after the other to make her acquaintance.

So agreeable do they make themselves that she keeps them all on her string, although each one thinks he is the favorite. The Captain is not immune from her charms, and he decides to lay court to her hand, but so infatuated is she with the gallant and attentive passengers that the Captain makes little headway.

Matilda is not the pretty teacher who is seen in the picture. That is not Matilda—that's the girl whose good looks caused the elderly but undersized masher to put on children's clothes and go to her kindergarten as a pupil, because he got fired out when he went in his proper person. As a pupil, the scheme might have worked to perfection, had it not been that the pretty teacher was engaged to be married, and the unexpected permitted her eager fiance to advance the day. A thoughtful school commissioner sent Matilda to relieve the good looking one, and Matilda was anything but a raving beauty. Just to show that there was no hard feeling, she started in by kissing all the helpless pupils, until she came to the masquerader. The masher didn't want to be kissed by any centenarian with a face like a chromo left out in the rain. He dodged and left his golden curls in her hands. She saw his bald head, realized that it was a man, and the race was on. She chased him into the river, rescued him and then insisted that he marry her for saving his life. The worst of it was that the pretty teacher was at the parson's getting married, too, and she heartlessly backed up Matilda in her contentions.

THE GREENHORN AND THE GIRL

Greenness is merely a question of degree, and the greenhorn was not green in many respects. He was not so green that he did not manage to keep the boss's pretty niece for himself when he found out that it was she and not the boss's old maid sister he had to meet, and by the time the other fellows got through they had come to the conclusion that the greenhorn was not green, even though he could hit the bullseye only when he held the gun against the barn door. It is one of those Western comedies that always make strong appeal, but there are moments of stress as well, and the photography is more than usually good.

A few days later, when the steamer gets well upon the bosom of the deep and the boat begins to roll and rock, the passengers begin to feel seasick, and one by one they succumb to "mal de mer." They are so absorbed in looking over the side of the ship and sustaining their equilibriums they neglect and entirely forget the pretty widow.

They are obliged to seek the recesses of their cabins until the coast is left entirely clear for the Captain, who puts in an appearance and soon engrosses the attention of the lady in weeds, until she finds herself infatuated with his winning and convincing way. By easy stages the man of the mighty deep seizes the helm and lands his fair and graceful sail into port and makes her fast to his every wish, and they are as good as spliced.

When the passengers come on deck and try to regain the lost vantage they gradually realize the lay of the land, and it is a question whether they are not sicker than they were before the Captain made himself master of the lady's hand as well as the master of the ship.

"HOW SHE WON HIM."—Some possess youth; others good looks, and still others have money, but Muriel Hanson has all three and she is engaged to be married to a fine young man named Arthur Lewis, whose father, supposed to be a wealthy man, dies penniless. The young man is obliged to start out in life as best he can. He does not wish to hold his intended to her betrothal to a poor man, writes her, releasing her to marry some one else if she chooses or wait until he has made a position for himself.

Her uncle, in whom she confides, gives her an idea. She must write Arthur, telling him she has lost her fortune and must go to work as a poor girl to fight life's battle. Then the uncle addresses a letter to the young man, offering him a position with the firm of "Hanson, Hanson & Co." She assumes the stenographer's place in the office, and when Arthur calls in answer to the letter he is surprised to see Muriel working there.

They are pleased to meet each other, and they renew their engagement on an equal basis. The uncle, her father's brother, employs Arthur Lewis at a good salary, and the young chap feels that the wedding day is not far off. Arthur has an awakening, however, which comes as a great and pleasant surprise and convinces him and her that theirs is a true, not a mercenary love, for the renewal of their troth was made when both were presumably poor. The surprise comes to him when he reads that his sweetheart is still an heiress and is made president of the firm of Hanson, Hanson & Co. by the will of her late father.

"THE THREE OF THEM."—The strength of a story or picture is in the penetration of that most vital of all interest—the heart—and that is the secret of the force and beauty of "The Three of Them." The mainspring of life is the child; it is the axis around which all the higher and deeper motives revolve. Parental love is the strongest and most natural. A childless [illegible] is like a ship without a compass.

It is not strange that the wife who is not a mother longs to take to her heart and home some motherless child, and that is just what Mrs. Welton did when she read in a magazine that she might take from the asylum Ernest, a little orphan boy, into her home for two weeks. Her husband is opposed to it, but does not interfere with her doing so. Gradually Mr. Welton becomes quite interested in the boy and his many little pastimes. His wife sees this and she is happy. She loves the boy dearly, and when the two weeks are ended she can hardly bear to part with him when she has to take him back to the asylum.

Returning to her home, she is heartbroken. The absence of the child robs it of its homeliness, and she is depressed with her loneliness, her heart full destitute. Her husband notices her condition and he decides to go to the asylum and bring the boy to their home for adoption. Acting upon the impulse he brings the boy back, and when his wife, who has worn herself out fretting, is sleeping, the youngster kisses her. She awakens and can scarcely believe her eyes. She clasps him to her bosom, then throws her arm around her husband's neck in gratitude for the satisfying of her heart's desire.

The boy becomes their child, they become his parents, and the three of them are happy in the love of a completed household.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"A SUMMER IDYL."—Fascination and infatuation are simply forms of hypnotism. They are like habits formed and almost impossible to crush. Such was the fate of Albert Woodson, a talented young artist, who became madly infatuated with Cora Irwin, a fellow artist. Cora's atelier was the rendezvous of the members of the higher Bohemia, and at her little receptions there always gathered the men and women of arts and letters. Among them was Albert Woodson, and during the course of one of these affairs he proposes marriage to the seemingly nonchalant Cora, who regards his protestation as a joke and laughingly rejects his proposal. Despondent, Albert goes to his home and decides to take a long walking trip in the country, where he hopes to crush that infatuation for the heartless Cora. As he trudges through the fields, his mind is occupied admiring the beauty of the land, which enthralls him so as to almost forget the cold-hearted artist. Here he meets a pretty little shepherdess as she feeds her sheep. Her artlessness and beauty make such an impression on him that Cora has now gone entirely from his thoughts. It is a case of love at first sight, and it is not all one-sided, for the little maid is attracted by him. She indeed falls deeply in love with him. Cora, meanwhile, has regretted her action, and learning Albert's address, sends him the following letter: "Dear Albert—I was only teasing when I laughed at your proposal. Come to me.—Your Cora." This note reaches Albert while he is out strolling with the little shepherdess. He mentally compares the two and decides in favor of the country maiden, so Cora's plea is ignored. To be by the little one's side, Albert engages as a farmhand, and the poor old grandpa of the girl, with whom she lives, seeing them so much together, anticipates that he will soon be left in loneliness. Cora, determined to win him back, makes a more subtle endeavor. She writes a second note:—"Dearest: Why don't you come to me? I am giving a little reception in your honor. Do please grace the occasion. With heart yearning, Your own Cora" Before sealing the letter she encloses the butt of a cigarette which she has been smoking. At first Albert is inclined to treat this second letter as he did the first, but the sight and aroma of the cigarette conjure up in his mind the fascination scenes of Bohemia and his old infatuation returns. The city's call is irresistible, and back he goes to the gayeties of the metropolis. The farm scenes shown during the course of the story are undoubtedly the most beautiful ever photographed, showing farm life as it really is.

"LITTLE ANGELS OF LUCK."—Language fails when endeavoring to fully describe the wonderful influence of the child upon matters of great moment in life. Often are they made the messengers of Divine Providence, also the tools in the hand of fate. Their plea is a demand irresistible, and in this Biograph subject is shown how their childish sincerity lifts from the household the impenetrable clouds of despair. Edward Rose, as president of the Independent Sugar Company, has proved a formidable antagonist of the giant Sugar Trust. His is the only concern which has withstood its advances, and so it is a most desirable acquisition. Rose has received an intimation, that really amounts to a threat, it would be of mutual benefit should he submit gracefully. He, however, is adamant in his defiance, showing a commendable pugnacity that is admired by the trust's president himself. But in every battle we must look for the traitor, and Rose's partner plays the Judas, so that the next morning finds Rose a ruined man, sold out to the trust by his own partner. Crushed in spirit Rose goes home, where his wife is now acquainted with the disaster through the newspapers. The two little children are amazed and hurt at their papa's cold negligence, and are at a loss to know why he should so ignore them, and they become little eavesdroppers at the door of the reception room into which Mr. and Mrs. Rose have gone to talk over the calamity. From what they hear they understand that the president of the Sugar Trust took papa's money away from him, so they take the savings from their little bank and tender it to help papa. Their papa is too occupied with his gloomy thoughts to notice the little ones. Suddenly a bright idea occurs to Alice. "We will go to see President Sugar Trust." Writing a note and enclosing their savings they start off, these two innocent children, for Wall Street, having gotten the address from the telephone book. There they trudge hand in hand, a sort of new species of lambs in the street. They insist upon seeing the Sugar King at once. Brought before him, little Alice hands him her note which reads:—"Dear Prezident Shugar Trust:—Papa ses you tok all hiz money. Pleze take our's insted and giv him hiz.—Alice and Ruth." At the same time she proffers her savings. The old gentleman, being a family man with children and grandchildren in whom he is wrapped up, is deeply touched by the innocent candor of these little tots, and, turning to his desk, writes a letter to their papa, with which they return, their absence not even having been noticed. This letter offers their papa a position as general manager of the sugar interests with a salary of $15,000 a year.

PICTURES DRAW WELL AT COMIQUE.

It is not necessary for the management of the Comique theatre, New Haven, Conn., to reiterate their claims to conducting a motion picture theatre which is in every respect high class. The general theatre-going public recognize it by patronizing the popular little theatre week in and week out, regardless of the condition of temperature and weather.

Manager Winstrom says that never before in the history of the house have superior pictures been exhibited than those for the present week. They portray scenes of passion and human heart interest that will make those who witness them forget for the moment their own troubles and transfer them into another world where romance, love and adventure will be wasted, in a fashion most lifelike and realistic.

D. E. RICE TO BUILD UP CIRCUIT.

D. E. Rice, of Calumet Mich., and Charles Skiff, manager of Mr. Rice's moving picture theatre in Negaunee, were in Marquette recently, looking over the Quayle block on South Main street, with a view of opening a picture house there. Mr. Rice has been given an option on the store room and he stated that if he is permitted to alter the place to suit the needs of a picture house, he will put in a theatre, starting work within a short time. Mr. Rice estimates that it will take about $2,000 to remodel the front and equip the theatre. The room is a large one and it is figured that in the neighborhood of 400 seats can be put in. If Mr. Rice decides to go ahead with the deal he will put in an attractive lobby, about twelve feet in depth, and will contruct a slanting entrance from the street, doing away with the step now in front.

Mr. Rice has met with good success in managing moving picture theatres. He has three in operation in the copper country, in addition to the one in Negaunee. The house he recently fitted up at Laurium is one of the most attractive picture theatres in the state. By having a circuit of houses of his own Mr. Rice will be able to change his singers frequently, and also to secure a better grade of pictures and at a less cost than would be possible if he had but one house.

ditions, than that some nervy producer with his camera squad should take, for example, the disgraceful scenes of rioting and assault lately to be seen on the streets of Columbus, Ohio? If union men could only control the unruly members of their organizations, so that law and order would be observed and obeyed, there could not, and would not be any such moving pictures. Every good citizen of this country, who has not an axe to grind, is the friend of union labor, and they are in the vast majority. But union labor organizations and leaders would do well to strengthen and maintain order in their ranks, before accusing film manufacturers of attempting to discredit them.

There is absolutely no foundation in fact for such an accusation, for it would be a repetition of the old story of the mouth refusing food in order to get even with the stomach were film manufacturers to adopt such a discriminating policy. In other words, it would be the case of "A house divided against itself."

Geo. H. Hines, that former old moving picture war horse of Senate theatre fame, on West Madison, opened his new $50,000 house, the Lyda, at 48th Avenue and Lake Street, Monday evening, August 29, under the most favorable auspices.

There were two performances during the evening, the first beginning at 7.30 p. m., the entertainment being furnished by five vaudeville acts, booked by the Western Vaudeville Manager's Association, and one reel of pictures. Prof. Lahl's orchestra played the accompaniments to the various acts and several well-received overtures.

About 250 invited guests were present at the first performance, among whom were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Wm. N. Selig, Mr. and Mrs. John Hardin, Mr and Mrs. F. C. Aiken, Mr. and Mrs. Leroy T. Goble, Mr. and Mrs. John Bell and Mr. C. J. Hoffman and Miss Hoffman, all well known in film circles. Every remaining seat was occupied by those who paid for admittance and, judging from the applause extended the various unmbers on the program, every soul present was a rooter for the Lyda and for the success of its hustling manager.

But by no means must it be inferred that the jolly entertainers on the bill—Arthur Deming, of oldtime minstrel memories; the Wilson Bros., rapid fire German comedians; the Harmony Quartette, in classic vocal and piano selections, and the Deonzo Bros. in neck-and-limb-threatening acrobatic stunts, by no means must it be thought that they did not deserve the applause so liberally bestowed. The only exception marked down by me against the bill was that pictures were given so small a place. Just one reel and that very poorly shown, owing to faulty framing and inadequate light! But then it was opening night. Yet the vaudeville acts went without a hitch!

The Lyda has a neat and attractive exterior and the interior appointments bespeak comfort and ease. It will seat a few over 900 people, and on opening night everybody was pleased with the roomy chairs and the wide intervening spaces between the rows. These substantial chairs are of green Flemish finish with dark maroon Spanish leather upholstering. The A. H. Andrews Co., of Chicago, furnished them. The stage is spacious and the proscenium opening permits a good view of all parts of it from any seat in the house.

Handsome souvenir programs in Nile green taffeta were provided for all the first-nighters.

Good luck to the Lyda, to its manager, and to his amiable wife, whose name the theatre bears!

Chicago Film Brevities.

"The Three Friends"—an aged man, his horse and dog—and "The Dunce's Cap," two short films by Gaumont and soon to be released by George Kleine, should be secured by every exhibitor. They are simply immense for children and hold the attention of the adult as well, in highly sympathetic fashion.

Charles C. Pyle, formerly manager of the Standard Film Exchange, and who resigned that position two weeks ago, has been offered and has accepted a position with the General Film Company of this city. The duties of Mr. Pyle will place him in a position next to that of Mr. Scates, who is assistant manager, and during the illness of the latter, Mr. Pyle will assist Manager F. C. Aiken.

W. O. Edmunds, of Winnipeg, paid a brief visit to the city last week.

The new factory annex and studios at the Selig plant are now ready for roofing and will be completed in about two weeks. Had it not been for the strike of structural iron workers here, the buildings would have been finished six weeks ago.

The Essanay Guide, just out, and covering September 15-30, shows capital photographs of Hank and Lank, the Essanay comedy twins, on its front cover. It also contains a handsome litho insert, quarto size, in 7 colors, of the Indian Head trademark, which is intended for use in theatre lobbies, when an Essanay picture is on the bill.

Hobart Bosworth, leading man of Selig's Los Angeles stock company, will appear with the Belasco theatre stock company in 'Frisco, in "The Servant in the House," the week beginning September 4, by courtesy of the Selig Polyscope Co. Mr. Bosworth was formerly a prominent member of the Belasco company.

Fred Smith, proprietor and manager of the Argyle theatre, Argyle street and Evanston avenue, had an enjoyable experience recently, caused by his cutting out cheap vaudeville and putting in a first-cless licensed film service. Some time ago he ran vaudeville with two reels of pictures and illustrated songs. Result, an empty house. Dispensing with the vaudeville and adding two more reels to his service manager Smith has not only packed his house daily but is turning them away.

Manager Rhode, of the Rhode Opera House, Kenosha, Wis., is a strong believer in newspaper advertising for pictures. He makes a specialty of booming feature films, and on such occasions one can always find a long reading notice on the front page of the leading paper and a large display advertisement on another page. Mr. Rhode gave "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest" splendid publicity.

Mr. A. McMackin, of the Essanay publicity department, tells me that up to Aug. 26, he received 750 letters, with five names to each letter, embracing nearly 4,000 names, in connection with the Essanay name contest. Some of the substitutes suggested for "moving picture theatre" are fairly good and the replies show a great deal of interest, considerable research and serious thought.

Charles Smith, manager of the Lyric theatre, Elgin, Ill., came in smiling to the General Film Co.'s office, this city, early last week, having survived the strenuous days of the automobile races in his home city. Mr. Smith reports fine business and looks for exceptional results this Fall.

CARL TH. GOLDENBERG, SUITE 23-24 20 Nassau Street, New York City

The Foster theatre, at Foster and Evanston avenues, formerly ran five fairly good vaudeville acts with two changes weekly for an admission of 10 and 20 cents. The receipts failed to pay expenses, and the owners were losing money right along, up to June 17. The vaudeville was cut out and a straight moving picture program was advertised for the summer months. It took just about two weeks to get the people out so that the house was filled to capacity at every show. The owners have made money all through the summer and, it is understood, will leave vaudeville strictly alone henceforth.

The Home Theatre Company, of Chicago, will open a new theatre that will seat 300 people, at 6320 Cottage Grove avenue, Saturday, Sept. 3. Straight moving pictures will form the entertainment, the General Film Co. furnishing the service. Bert Heather will be the manager of the new house.

J. Craidone, manager of the Lyric, Janesville, Wis., was a visitor at the offices of the General Film Company last week. He said business was very satisfactory in his city.

C. M. Walker, of the Orpheum theatre, Plymouth, Ind., was in the city last week, and speaks highly of business in his section.

Manager Bommerscheim of the Lyric, Streator, Ill., was in the General Film Company's offices early last week looking over his bookings. The Lyric is playing to satisfactory business.

WEDDED IN "AIRDOME"

Manager Trigger Pulls Off Big Social Event at Pastime Theatre, New York

A few weeks ago Samuel H. Trigger, one of the managers of the Pastime Airdome, 110th Street and 5th Avenue, dared a friend, Julius C. Czito, of 2049 Washington Avenue, New York City, to be married on the stage of the Pastime Theatre. "If you will," said Trigger, "there's a hundred dollars, a trip west, and a wedding breakfast for you."

"That's a pretty good proposition," said Czito, who was at the time engaged to Miss Mary Holzer, of 440 East 66th Street, "and after I consult her, I think we can arrange it."

"Go ahead," said Mr. Trigger, "and I'll make good my promise."

Within a few days Mr. Czito notified Manager Trigger that his prospective bride had consented to the proposition and that they were ready any time.

For the next few days there were some busy men in the neighborhood of 110th Street. Mr. Trigger, in order to "do the thing up brown," invited all his political friends, among whom were "Big Tim" Sullivan, ex-Sheriff Foley, Magistrate Breen, Police Captain Hammond, Tom Sharkey and other well known politicians to be present, and they were, together with hundreds of Harlemites who were all "het up" over the affair.

When the day was set and all arrangements were completed, Mr. Trigger hired a taxi and secured the Rev. Herbert B. Elliott, who is not only one of the best known clergymen in the city, but also bears the reputation of being the oldest Presbyterian minister in the state, to officiate. The ceremony took place at 9 o'clock, on the evening of August 31, in the presence of over 2,500 persons.

The young couple entered the airdome from the Fifth Avenue side, and walked on the stage. All the lights in the place were extinguished, with the exception of the spot light from the motion picture machine, which threw its brilliant rays on the bridal party.

The bride wore a white silk princess gown, with a long train. She also wore a veil of tulle and carried a handsome bouquet of bride roses.

Immediately after the ceremony Mr. Trigger took a number of his friends to the Parkway Hotel, where an elaborate dinner was given, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Czito. Before the guests sat down he handed over to the bridegroom a little leather bag which contained one hundred dollars in gold.

Mr. and Mrs. Czito left the next morning on their honeymoon trip west. This wedding is said to be the first ever taken place in a motion picture theatre.

MAKING "LIFE PORTRAYALS."

Vitagraph Players Doing a Variety of Water Scenes—Other Notes.

Down at Manhasset Beach, on the dunes of Long Island Sound, there is a company of actors and actresses in scenes of plays grave and gay, including some of the most beautiful surfs lashing the rock bound coast or graceful waves quietly lapping the white, sandy beaches; stirring rescues by daring swimmers and exciting speed breaking dashes of launch and motor boats to the help of the foundering sailboats or the escaping villains—the very things that make a moving picture a work of art and lend brilliancy and variety to the photography.

You can readily guess what company it is when you see the fleet of motor boats, launches and sails flying the "V," it's the Vitagraph Company and you can rely upon it they will soon set before us a feast of summer idyls and seashore dreams.

They started on their final summer campaign last Tuesday and the caravan of automobiles that started from the studio with supplies and company made quite a long and attractive procession.

Mr. Victor Smith, cashier of the Vitagraph, with his family, will start for Southern California on Sept. 16, to visit his father and brothers who live in that section of the country.

The day after Labor Day, "Playing at Divorce" and "A Rough Weather Courtship" will be the program offered by the Vitagraph. Friday, Sept. 9 "How She Won Him" will demand our attention. "A Sepoy's Wife" on Saturday, Sept. 10, is an example of "life portrayal" worthy of our deepest consideration and deliberation. Labor Day is a day of rest; the most restful thing we know of is a Vitagraph life portrayal.

Mr. Walter McAdams who has been with the Vitagraph Company for some years has started in business for himself in the theatrical district on upper Broadway with a full line of costumes, "make-ups" and other theatrical accessories.

A LUBIN REVIVAL?

"Meet Me at the Fountain" May be Done Over —A "White Plague" Story Coming.

It is not improbable that the picture audiences of the present day will be given opportunity to see the most famous of all the Lubin release, "Meet Me at the Fountain," in a splendid revival done in the brilliant photography of to-day and played with a finish that was not demanded in the days when this subject was young. In its day "Meet Me at the Fountain" was a sensation, but few of the present day audiences paid much attention to pictures then and it would be a real novelty to most audiences. In this connection the Magnetic Film Service of Cincinnati reports a revival of last year's "A Hot Time in Atlantic City" is enjoying a new popularity. With a new print, and booming by means of the Hennegan & Co. posters, this rapid action comedy is helping to break records in Ohio houses.

One of the coming Lubin releases will be a sea coast picture made in the same picturesque places which made comment last season when several coast pictures were released. The newest marine topic will be released in a few weeks and is notable for a clean cut story as well as picturesque placement of scenes.

The open air treatment of the White Plague is the theme of one of the Lubin releases of current issue. Those who have seen the advance prints are loud in their praise of the treatment of the story which is a love story of gripping interest in addition to a forceful argument in favor of the prevention camps. The camp pictures were made at Fairhaven, N. J., where there is located one of the largest tuberculosis camps in the country.

SCOTT & VAN ALTENA.

"STOP YOUR BLUSHING, ROSIE."—Written and composed by Lewis and Bennett, co-authors of "Daddy Was a Grand Old Man," "Take Your Hands Away," "Under the Blushing Moon," etc,, and Monroe H. Rosenfeld, author of "Take Back Your Gold," "With All Her Faults I Love Her Still," and many famous successes. Published by M. H. Rosenfeld, New York. The song, which deals with Cupid and a pair of youthful lovers, is exceptionally well illustrated with a variety of beautiful pictures, artistically posed and wonderfully colored. The set contains some very new and novel slides which are always to be found in Scott & Van Altena's sets.

"I WANT TO BUY A LITTLE BIT OF LOVE."—By Chas. K. Harris. This is the pathetic story of a little girl who was under the care of a stepmother. She went one day with a few pennies to a candy store to ask if she could not buy a little bit of love. The stepmother happened in the store, heard the call of the child's soul and straightway opened her heart to her, becoming thereafter almost a real mother. The slides tell the story in a very interesting manner, for the child is so cute that one could not help but bestow upon it the deepest affection.

"TAKE ME WITH YOU, CUTY, AND FORGET TO BRING ME BACK."—That listens well. Surely with such lyrics, catchy music, and illustrations posed for by such charming models, this song cannot help but become at once popular at picture theatres. It has a light, breezy air that cheers, dispelling all gloom and displeasure. Published by Leo Feist.

"THE HONEYMOON GLIDE."—Words by Jos. H. McKeon; music by W. Raymond Walker; published by Harry Von Tilzer Pub. Co. This song has an air that is a hummer. Hear it once and you'll want to hear it six times, as well as join in on the chorus. It is one of those songs that make you feel lively and happy. The slides, posed for by a very pretty little miss and handsome youth, are very striking. Novelties, as usual, a-plenty.

"UNDER THE YUM YUM TREE."—Words by Sterling; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Von Tilzer Music Co. We have all been there—under the yum yum tree—gazing into loving eyes and whispering soft foolishness, etc. The song surely is a good one, one of Von Tilzer's best, which is saying a good deal. Each slide in this fine set has the stamp of quality, the quality which gives the work of Scott & Van Altena a certain character which we all know.

"MY DIXIE DREAM."—Published by Harry Von Tilzer Music Pub. Co., New York; words and music by Earle Taylor, writer of "My Southern Rose." Another Southern song by this author that bids fair to have the same popularity as his preceding one. The slides for this song are in typical Scott & Van Altena style—cleverly posed, more than excellently colored and containing novelties galore. The models too are good looking and very graceful.

"LITTLE STAR WON'T YOU TWINKLE."—Lyrics by Tell Taylor; melody by Chas. L. Johnson; published by Harold Rossiter Music Co. A beautiful ballad by Chas. Johnson, writer of "Iola," "Dill Pickles" and other hits. Most of the pictures are moonlight scenes, and are extremely well executed, considering that it is so difficult to imitate moonlight scenes. The set is well supplied with novelties, which are striking and original. The models are exceptionally good looking. Taking all in all the set is really unique.

"LOVE DREAMS."—Words and music by Luella Lockwood Moore; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co. This is a beautiful little love ballad that tells of a young Venetian couple who fall desperately in love with one another. The illustrations show the pair on the canals of Venice, beautiful gondolas, pomp and gaiety. The pretty little model in this instance is she who posed for the slides of Scott & Van Altena's "Espanolia Sprance." She is dark and beautiful, fitting well the part of a Venetian daughter. The male model, too, is just the one for this kind of a song. Coloring is beautiful and the scenic effects charming and wonderful.

DE WITT C. WHEELER.

"FIFTY YEARS AGO."—(Dear Old Chums). Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L'Albert; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. The lyrics portray the love of an old couple, which has spanned a period of 50 years. The melody is by the composer of "Hiawatha," who sometimes uses the nom-de-plume of "L'Albert." The slides tell the story only too well of this loving old couple so rich in steadfastness. We see them in their old age and we see them as they were in youth, 50 years ago, dressed in the picturesque garb of that period. We see also many very beautiful rural scenes that are assuredly of home interest. Beautifully posed and colored in Wheeler's excellent style.

"LOVE ME AGAIN."—Words and music by Robert M. Stults; published by F. B. Haviland, New York. A love ballad of the higher order, written in masterly style, and fully up to the standard of quality set by the house of Haviland. Illustrations of excellent photographic quality and clever posing, rich in nature study and human interest, are produced by Wheeler.

"BY THE MOSS COVERED WELL, DEAR ESTELLE."—Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L. Albert; published by J. H. Remick & Co. One of the timely love ballads, written in a reminiscent theme. Both lyrics and melody do full justice to the writers. The slides are of the truly Wheeler type that we like to see. They are of the dainty order, which appeal to the sense of beauty; posed in country style near a quaint old well, and are beautifully colored with the tone of nature.

"SUGAR MOON."—Published by J. H. Remick & Co. It is seldom in late years that a coon song becomes popular, but this one is certainly it, and looks like a hit. It is also seldom that we view a set of "darky" slides, so that when the opportunity is presented to do so, as in this set of Mr. Wheeler's, it is a novelty. The illustrations are full of characteristic southern poses of the black race. They are cleverly and amusingly carried out so as to make this set a very interesting one.

"SPOONLIGHT."—Words by Earle Clinton; music by Charlotte Blake; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. This is a true spooning song, and Mr. Clinton has taken full advantage of his subject and produced an exceptionally good set of lyrics. The melody has a clever swing which cannot fall to become popular. The slides do full justice to the song and are posed by good looking models who fall into natural poses. The moonlight effects reflect credit on the Wheeler slides, and the last slide is a girl surrounded with spoons, which produces a novel effect. An exceptionally good set of slides.

"IT'S MOONLIGHT ALL THE TIME ON BROADWAY."—Words by Ren Shields; music by Percy Wenrich; published by F. B. Haviland Publishing Co., New York. It would be useless to criticize either the lyrics or melody of this song, as these writers can always be depended upon to produce the goods, and they certainly have not failed in this instance. Mr. Wheeler has produced a set of slides every one of which is a novelty, and the effects of the Great White Way illuminated by night reproduced in a small lantern slide are truly wonderful. This set is without doubt the best set released by any slide maker, and shows what vast improvements are constantly being added to the productions of this house.

"I'M A LUCKY BOY TO HAVE A GIRL LIKE YOU." Words by Stanley Murphy; music by Percy Wenrich; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. It is a pretty story. Not only at the wedding nuptials, but after many happy years of married life the husband feels ever lucky to have for a wife the one he possesses. The slides tell the story in a quaint way, giving many phases of country life and true love upon the farm.

"WHEN THE SUMMER DAYS ARE GONE."—Words by Leo Curley; music by Geo. Christie; published by Witmark & Sons. While the summer days are not yet gone, this song may seem unseasonable, but it was so good the publishers couldn't wait, so published it ahead of time. The slides by Wheeler certainly do show some fine selections of scenery by him. It would seem that all the beauties of nature full bloom in the summertime are pent up in this little set. Seashore, mountains, rivers, lakes and woods are all here, beautifully colored and charming to look at.

LEVI COMPANY.

"I'LL BUILD A FENCE AROUND YOU."—Words by Samuel M. Lewis; music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills. This is one of those simple little songs for which Mills is noted. A very catchy melody already being whistled about the city. The slides are exceptionally good and contain some great novelties. Both models are from "The Summer Widowers," now playing at the Broadway Theatre, and are exceedingly good looking, all of which go to make this the best set of slides the Levi Co. has ever turned out.

"SMILING EYES."—Words by J. Young; music by Minerva W. Fields; published by Church, Paxson Co. The title explains the story. Just a pair of smiling blue eyes. They are not the kind that hypnotize or mesmerize, but the kind that simply tantalize. Fine lyrics with a great melody. The slides are just as good and help to make this song a big winner.

"ROSY CHEEKS."—Words by Dave Oppeheim; music by Joe Cooper; published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. This is a real novelty song, one that will make any audience sit up and take notice. The Levi Co. have discovered a most beautiful girl, now playing in "Up and Down Broadway," who fits the title to perfection, and is sure to carry this song to a tremendous popularity. In the photography, posing and coloring of this set the Levi Co. have reached the highest point in the art of making song slides.

"STELLA, DEAR."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams. A beautiful march ballad with a melody that is simply fascinating. Easy to sing and one that stays with you. The slides are very beautiful, both models being exceptionally good looking, and the photography and coloring excellent. A first class set of slides in every particular.

"ANY LITTLE GIRL, THAT'S A NICE LITTLE GIRL, IS THE RIGHT LITTLE GIRL FOR ME."—Words by Thomas J. Gray; music by Fred Fischer; published by M. Shapiro. This is the biggest hit published by M. Shapiro within the last three years, and the melody is being whistled by almost every street urchin. The slides are good.

"JUST FOR A GIRL."—Published by M. Witmark & Sons. This song is the biggest number that the Witmark concern has put out in some time and is an absolute hit. Slides are first class in every particular, and are beautiful. The demand will be heavy owing to the extreme popularity of the song, and you should place your order immediately.

"JESSAMINE."—Words and music by Frank B. Williams; published by Shapiro. A pretty love ballad surpassing many of its kind published heretofore. A set of slides by Levi that delight the audience.

"BYE BYE, SWEETHEART."—Words and music by Will Wood. A little gem of a song, refined and melodious. The slides contain many bright and snappy novelties and illustrate well this love song.

"WHEN THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET WAS NEW."—Words by Geo. Moriarity; music by Joe Cooper, writers of the big song hit, "I Can't Miss That Ball Game." Published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. The melody is very sweet and worthy of a pronounced success. Slides in typical Levi style illustrate the lyrics in an interesting fashion.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON.

"IN THE LITTLE TOWN ACROSS FROM JERSEY CITY."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham; published by Shapiro. This is a very pleasing novelty song in which a New York youth tells his companions of the charm of the "Little Town" in a very clever set of lyrics, which are set to exceedingly good music as is characteristic of the melodies of the author of "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Goodbye Peter; Goodbye Paul," "Mr. Johnson Goodnight," etc. Simpson has shown in a beautiful set of slides the home in the country, the trip on the ferry boat, New York Bay and the Hudson River. The wonderful skyscrapers, Singer Building, etc., as well as street scenes—Herald Square in the grip of a blizzard; real Indians in all of their war paint on Fifth avenue.

"AS WE LISTENED TO THE RUSTLE OF THE LEAVES."—Words and music by J. Haydon Clarendon, author of "It's Only An Old-Fashioned Cottage," "What Is the World Without You." This is a very high class ballad telling of the love of olden time. The music is sweet and tuneful and Simpson has posed a pleasing series of pictures in natural scenery of glowing autumn scenes as was suggested by the lyrics. The coloring shows the master hand of the artist, great attention being given to detail.

"I WILL LOVE YOU ALWAYS JUST FOR AULD LANG SYNE."—Words by Robert Roden; music by Ed. V. Cupero. This ballad is another of Helf's hits, and is being sung with great success by that sweet singer, Tom McKenna, in Dockstader's Minstrels. Simpson has illustrated this dainty love-poem with great feeling. The models are more than usually good looking and the posing reminds one of the beautiful slides he made for the "Sunbonnet Sue" song. Coloring is artistic.

"I LOVE YOU AS THE ROSES LOVE THE DEW."—Words by Richard Buck; music by Theodore Morse, composer of "Starlight," "Farewell My Bluebell" and many other hits: published by F. B. Haviland. While this song has been out some time, it is gaining in popularity every day. Simpson is receiving a great many orders for slides, due in as much to their own beauty as to the merit of the song itself.

"DON'T YOU WISH IT WAS SUMMER."—By Nora Bayes and Jack Norworth. This is the song the above mentioned artists have been making such a hit with all summer in the "Jolly Bachelors," taking any number of encores at every performance. The song has just been released for general use. Simpson has made a set of slides quite worthy of this charming number, both artistic and illustrative of the theme of the story. The girl is exquisitely dainty, and the coloring beautiful. This song is published by the Norworth Pub. Co.

"YOU ARE THE IDEAL OF MY DREAMS."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of "All That I Ask of You Is Love," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night.' Published by Shapiro. This is one of the ballad hits of the year,

FOREST PARK PEOPLE SEE NO HARM IN FIGHT PICTURES.

"It's great! There's no brutality shown in these pictures, and no reason why they should be prohibited in any theatre." This was the unanimous opinion of members of the Forest Park village board regarding the moving picture display of the Jeffries-Johnson fight expressed an hour after an ordinance had been presented in the council meeting aimed particularly at the reproduction of the Reno fight. Sheriff Strassheim was advised Aug. 22 by his attorney that exhibition of the fight pictures is not a crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the statutes.

A SUMMER IDYL

A Beautiful Biograph Pastoral

Here is a story of what really does happen in life, for while we show the poetic side of the episode the finish is as it usually turns out in reality. A young artist falls in love with a girl who is also an artist. He proposes to her, but she laughs at his proposition. Disheartened he goes to the country where he meets a pretty little shepherdess for whom he forms quite an attachment. This ripens into love, but this is of short duration, for the young lady artist, regretting her action lures him back to her. This is the way it usually happens. Simple life is all right for a while, but it palls.

Approx. length, 991 feet.

Released Sept. 8th, 1910.

POLICE CHIEF UPHOLDS PICTURES

Tell Members of Ministerial Alliance Boxing Prevents Shooting and Knife Play.

The clergymen of the East St. Louis Ministerial Alliance, certainly did show the white feather last week, when they went to Chief of Police Purdy and asked him to stop the showing of the films of the Jeffries-Johnson contest. It was not that the Chief upheld the fight pictures so much, but he made it clear that the preachers didn't know what they were talking about and rather than be convinced that they were ignorant of the purpose of their visit, they left the Chief in full possession of the situation and "beat it."

When the ministers came to the Chief's office they presented a set of resolutions branding the pictures as brutal and demoralizing; that they caused the "Bluecoat" to think he was at a ribbon sale, they were so long.

In reply, Chief Purdy said: "Have you gentlemen seen the pictures?"

"We have not," was the committee's reply.

"Then I do not think you are competent to judge," said the chief with satisfaction.

When asked if the Chief had seen them, he said he had, and contended it was a poor exhibition of boxing, although the pictures were good and clear. The divines, then, thinking they could catch the Chief napping, asked him if he thought that boxing hurt "our boys," and should they be allowed to see boxing matches.

To this the Chief replied in the words of Mayor George Gonzales, of Hoboken: "If boys and men knew more about handling their hands there would be less gun play and cutting scrapes."

After those remarks the Chief offered to take the ministers to the theatre where the pictures were running and let them see the exhibition, free of charge. This they declined to do and after being told there was no law to stop them, they left the office, a wiser set of men.

ESSANAY'S BASEBALL COMEDY MADE BIG HIT.

The Essanay Company's baseball comedy picture "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," has proven one of the most successful comedy pictures that this firm has turned out in many months, and this is saying a great deal for the company whose comedy product is attracting so much favorable attention.

Letters from exhibitors all over the country have been received and all speak in a complimentary way about the baseball picture.

Mr. S. I. Levine of the Orpheum theater, one of Chicago's largest motion picture theaters, spoke very highly of the baseball picture.

"It is the best comedy picture we have had in many, many months," he said. "It is pretty hard to wake up a 9 o'clock audience, but we had them laughing all morning. The ladies seemed to like the picture particularly and during the afternoon, when the house is chiefly composed of ladies and children the house was in a continuous uproar all through the picture. We have had many requests to show the picture again and will repeat it within the next week or so. We show all the Essanay films, and always find them good."

TWO NEW PICTURE HOUSES FOR TEXAS.

Port Lavaca, Texas, is certainly coming along with a full supply of picture theatres—two more are now to be added, which will rank in equipment with any in the "Lone Star State." The first of the new houses to be erected will be located on North street, and will be under the management of Mrs. J. W. Thomas.

The other house will be on Guadaloupe street, and will be run by the Nicholson Bros.

WELL-KNOWN SINGER FOR PORT JERVIS.

Bert Hamer, a well-known baritone singer of Port Jervis, N. Y., has been engaged by manager R. C. Wyman, of the Family theater, to sing the illustrated songs during the coming season. Mr. Hamer has had several offers to sing at concerts but refused as he likes motion picture work.

Roland Bond has been engaged as operator,

WARNING

IT is high time that the trade should be informed of the extensive "duping" of Song Slides, and as it is an evident fact such a practice has been carried on by certain Song Slide Manufacturers, it necessarily became the province of the largest manufacturer in this line to put an end to such nefarious practice. While on a business trip last July, DE WITT C. WHEELER saw a set of slides manufactured by the Levi Company, of 24 Union Square, New York City, in which were reproduced stolen copies of his copyrighted slides. On his return he conferred with his attorney, Mr. Louis J. Rosett, of 29 Liberty Street, New York City, the result of which is fully set forth in Mr. Rosett's affidavit below, together with a letter from the Levi Company acknowledging that they copied the slides and returned to Mr. Rosett negatives which, they allege, are the original ones made. Whether they are the original or whether the Levi Company have another set we care nothing, as the statement of a concern who would wilfully pilfer the work of another should have little bearing with just business men.

Dear Sir:

With reference to the slides which your client De Witt C. Wheeler claims were copied from a song illustrated by your client, I beg to surrender to you the negatives which you claim are copies. I further wish to inform you that no more than ten sets of slides of this song were sold by us and there are no more sets on hand at this office.

Yours very truly,

STATE OF NEW YORK
CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK } SS.:

LOUIS J. ROSETT being duly sworn deposes and says that he is an attorney and counselor at law, duly licensed to practice as such with an office at No. 29 Liberty Street, in the City of New York, Borough of Manhattan, and resides at No. 522 West 136th Street, New York City.

Deponent further says that he is acquainted with JOSEPH LEVI of the LEVI CO., manufacturers of lantern slides at No. 24 Union Square, New York City, Borough of Manhattan.

Deponent further says that on the 25th day of August, 1910, he met the said JOSEPH LEVI at his office No. 24 Union Square, and in a conversation with the said LEVI with reference to certain lantern slides manufactured by the LEVI CO., the said LEVI admitted to deponent that three of the slides included in the set had been copied from a song previously illustrated by DE WITT C. WHEELER, INC. The said LEVI admitted further that the copyright mark on the slide manufactured by DE WITT C. WHEELER had been obliterated by the said LEVI in the copy and other minor changes had been made. The said LEVI thereupon declared to deponent that he was willing to make any and all reparation possible, and then surrendered to deponent the negative of the three slides aforesaid and promised and agreed not to sell any more sets of the song illustrated by him.

The said JOSEPH LEVI and his associate, MR. APPLEBAUM, further represented to deponent that no more than ten sets of slides of the song had been sold and that no more sets were then in stock, and further agreed that he would not sell any more sets of slides of the said song.

All of the "WHEELER" Slides are protected by United States Registered Trade Mark, and many are also copyrighted. It was some of these copyrighted slides that the Levi Company duped, thereby incurring a double penalty. Business "enterprises" such as this should be brought to account with no gentle hand, and they certainly should not receive the support of the trade. This is not the only instance known in which extensive "duping" has been carried on, and it is the purpose of this advert sement to solemnly warn all Slide Makers and Users that a strict watch will be kept and the full penalty exacted from all those having "duped" slides in their possession.

Reputable Slide Makers are using their best endeavors to elevate the quality of their product, but when cheap competition is foisted on them and they see the results of their energies and workmanship wilfully "duped" and then offered at a reduced price and advertised as "original" by the "duper," it is high time that the utmost publicity be made and the result left to the trade.

Is there anything more contemptible than copying the results of another man's originality and craft and selling it as the results of your own workmanship? WE LEAVE THE TRADE TO ANSWER THE QUESTION.

"HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY," but some people are not honest until they are made to be. They have no use in the hustling business life of today. The penalty of wrong doing in business is loss of business. This is simple justice.

You can rest assured that any infringement on our rights will be vigorously prosecuted, and it will be our aim to so better the quality of our product that there will be no room for the CHEAP IMITATOR.

We court honest, straightforward competition, as it is the life of trade, but the cheap, crafty imitator, whose work cannot help but be inferior—Bah!

CASUAL COMMENT

THIS is the season of fall openings. New theatres for motion pictures, and pictures with vaudeville, are springing up everywhere. Old theatres are being brushed up, remodelled and refitted against the opening of the indoor season which closely follows Labor Day. The scramble for the nimble nickel and the dodging dime will be more strenuous, if anything, than formerly. In the heat of competition it is more than possible that some will have their fingers burnt. With this possibility in danger of speedily becoming a reality The Film Index ventures to hang out the storm warning signal "Go slow."

There is more than one reason for the exercise of ordinary caution when embarking upon any amusement venture. Failures affect more than the individuals who lose their initial investment. The failure of a place of amusement is infectous; it has the effect of poisoning the public against the peculiar form of amusement with which the failure was identified. Give the thing a black eye in any particular locality and the discoloration will be a long time coming off. Black eyes are not popular in good society.

THERE are several ways of giving pictures a black eye: one way is to over do them. Too much of a good thing is tiresome. Too many picture theatres to the 1,000 of population breeds a form of competition that is productive of no profits. A profitless business calls for retrenchment and in the picture business that means poorer service than the public should have. When the public begins to realize that it is getting cheated it begins to get sore on the cheater. It will say "the pictures are getting rotten" and quit looking at them.

The need now is not more theatres, but better ones; always the best pictures obtainable shown amid the best surroundings obtainable.

CLASS of pictures is important. It looks as though this matter would have to be controlled largely by the exhibitor. It is for him to say what his patrons shall have. Today the exhibitor of licensed pictures is in little danger of adverse criticism. The National Board of Censorship drew the line and the Licensed Manufacturers have kept upon the right side of it.

Unfortunately for the business at large there seems to be no way to prevent the piffling and prurient productions of the piratical picture makers. Catering always to the lowest and cheapest element they continue to make and offer to the public pictures that are "rot" when they are not "rotten."

Self respecting exhibitors cannot afford to offer such productions to self-respecting people and hope to hold their patronage; neither can the exhibitor who brazenly forces pictures of low moral tone upon his public hope to escape the severest criticism and public condemnation.

Fewer pictures, but good ones, will serve better to the continuance of the business.

THE day when the motion picture was a means to the rapid accumulation of great wealth is past. The public has learned to discriminate and will demand the best, and the best is none too good, if the motion picture is to be made a permanent form of amusement.

ONE of the requisites of good pictures is good projection. Flickering pictures and an unsteady light are the results of ignorance. In these days there is no excuse for ignorance in the matter of projection. Competent men, experts in the manipulation of electricity and arc lights, and the manufacture of carbons, lenses and machines, are giving near-perfection in the devices necessary to project pictures, all of which are within reach.

In this connection we cannot let slip the opportunity to call attention to the instructive series of "Electrical Talks" on the relation of Electricity to the motion Picture Theatre, now appearing in The Film Index. Even picture theatre managers should study this subject and see that his operator studies it, too. Better pictures will be the result.

A TIP TO MANUFACTURERS

Louis F. Steuerle, president and manager of the Broadway Amusement Co., Louisville, Ky., which operates the Broadway Theatre of that city, writes at length to The Film Index on the subject of "bulletins." His letter is worth printing, so here goes:

The Film Publishing Company,
New York.

Gentlemen: We would like to offer a suggestion in regard to the advance sheets published by the manufacturers of film:

Up to the present time, the advance sheets seem to be made only for the benefit of the exhibitor. They give the story in its entirety just as the picture advances upon the screen; also showing individual illustration. These, as stated above, are solely for the benefit of the exhibitor in order that he may be guided in selecting his subjects.

We believe that the advance sheets could be used for a double purpose, as in our case. We use them, as a bulletin to our patrons. We have two large frames imbedded in the outer wall of our theatre and use these frames for the purpose of placing the advance sheets where our patrons, or passersby on the street, may read the story. This has proven a great success, as at all times during the day you will see people of all classes and ages gathered around these frames reading the story that is being shown upon the screen within.

The story, as given out in the advance sheets, is absorbing and the pictures interesting, for very often the pictures do not show the story in a clear or explicit manner and it is only by reading the advance sheets that you get any idea of what the picture really means.

Now the real object of this suggestion is to get the manufacturers to issue uniform advance sheets. You will notice all the manufacturers issue a different kind and size of advertising advance sheet. The Vitagraph, Selig and Pathe, have small booklets, Lubin, Edison, and Essanay a larger booklet, with generally a large size picture of the story. It is very hard to use these booklets, for the subject of the story is generally over a page in length and printed on both sides of the paper. If you wish to post the advance notice, you must have two books, as was necessary for us to do in posting the advance notice of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (three reels) and with the two books we were not able to get out all the pictures as issued in the book.

The best method is that used by the Biograph Company. They issue their advance sheets upon a single sheet of paper using only one side of it. First comes the name of the picture, then the illustration and beneath this is the story of the drama. The only fault we can find with the Biograph advance sheets is that they do not show large enough illustrations. All of the Biograph advance sheets are of a uniform size and can be placed in the frame provided for that purpose and as stated above. If all other manufacturers would make the same size advance sheets, a neat frame could be built and the advance sheets placed therein and the public given a general synopsis of what they would see within.

From experience we would advise all exhibitors to post the story of the film in a public place in front of their theatre, as many people go inside to see the drama enaeted on the screen after reading the story. This is almost as important as placing posters on the outside.

MORE "REVIVAL" SUGGESTIONS

Interest seems to be growing in the matter of revival of the big picture subjects. Several communications have been received during the last week with suggestions. Mr. H. E. Campbell, of the Majestic Theatre, Spencer, Ind., sends in quite a long list, among which will be found a number of the past year's features. In submitting his list, Mr. Campbell takes a crack at his brother at Sullivan, Ind., he says:

"Have read in the Index of 'picture revivals' and read what my brother in Sullivan submitted, but here is a list that I think will make his look like some of the 'Independent,' Every one of these pictures were moneymakers for us, and I believe the other exhibitors will agree with me on this point."

NAMES SOME BIG HITS.

"La Crosse, Wis., Sept. 1, 1910.

"The Film Index, New York City, N. Y.:

"Gentlemen.—While the question of reviving old films is being discussed let us by no means overlook the real big hits, such as:

"The Man Without a Country."
"Where is My Wandering Boy Tonight?"
"Why Girls Leave Home."
"An Army of Two."
"The Runaway Horse."

"Any house that will properly feature either of these reels for two or three days before running them will do a capacity business. We know. We ran "Where is My Wandering Boy Tonight?" three different times and played to larger houses the last time than the first. Respectfully yours,

"F. J. McWILLIAMS."

"Editor Index, New York:

"Dear Sir.—As an exhibitor I think that if the following pictures were revived I could hang the "S. R. O." sign out long before starting time and the crowd outside would willingly wait for their "turn."

"Cohen at Coney Island"—Vitagraph.
"Custer's Last Stand"—Selig.
"Life of Moses"—Vitagraph.
"Essanay's "Tag Day."
"Confidence"—Biograph.

A REAL AUSTRALIAN PICTURE WOMAN.

There floated into our sanctum sanctorium the other day a tall, slender, business-like young woman who handed us this message:

Dear Mr. Hoff: Permit me the pleasure of introducing to you Miss Phyllis Miller, the daughter of my Melbourne partner. She is now en route for Australia, and is quite "au fait" with the picture business. You will find her quite an interestng personalty, and any courtesy extended to her will be much appreciated by, Yours faithfully, T. J. WEST,

P. S.—I told Miss Miller to give you her photograph, and if you like to interview her, she will talk you picture business better than nine men out of any ten in Australia or England, and you might possibly like to record her impressions.—T. J. W.

That's our alibi, and it accounts for this story and the accompanying picture of Miss Miller. Mr. West, the writer of the letter quoted, is clever in his choice of words commending Miss Miller to us, but we have it to say that he did not overdraw the picture in the least, for no Englishman or Australian that we know has talked pictures more interestingly or intelligently than Miss Miller; not even T. J. himself for all that "the sun never sets on West's pictures."

MISS PHYLLIS MILLER.

While Miss Miller did not have an opportunity to add much of interest regarding the picture business in Australia that readers of The Film Index have not already been told, she emphasized the fact that the business of exhibiting pictures really reaches its highest development in Australia. Regarding this we have Miss Millers' promise of more detailed information upon her return home. We didn't consider it fair to nail her down to anything of that sort when she was "seeing New York," for the first time. Hence, you will observe that this is not the kind of an interview T. J. suggested.

Miss Miller is a native of Australia; her father and mother are Australians. She was born and brought up on a big ranch in Australia, belonging to her parents. When her father, Mr. J. A. Miller, became associated with Mr. West in the latter's picture enterprises in Melbourne, she took a deep interest in the business and is now conversant with the world's product.

During the last fourteen months she has been studying the business at the home offices of the T. J. West enterprises in London, and is now on her way home. She left New York on Aug. 29, spent a day at Niagara Falls, and four days in Chicago, from whence she went directly to Vancouver, B. C., with the purpose of sailing by the boat leaving Sept. 8 for Sydney.

Being an ardent horsewoman Miss Miller has planned to reach her home in time for the Melbourne Derby, which she says she would not miss for the world. We wish her "bon voyage."

WANTS LONG STORY PICTURES.

Let us have more long stories in the films. The writer is aware that there has been a demand for short snappy stories, two to a reel, but the exhibitors who have shown the three-reel picture of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" will bear me out that it was one of the biggest drawing cards ever put in a motion picture show. After witnessing the beautiful work of the actors in that grand story it is hard to conceive how it was ever boiled down to one reel. Exchanges will tell you that the demand for it was unprecedented and where it was properly advertised it broke all attendance records. As a money getter it proved a godsend to a number of the smaller houses in the hot weather period of August.

Now there are numerous other stories that can be filmatized, without having to cut out all the interesting detail to get it into one reel. They could even be worked into continued stories and in larger theatres worked two or three nights. There are many famous stories that have in the past worked into the film that could "come back" and be a much greater success than when first put out on account of the big improvement in film-acting and effects.

I do not pretend to give the names of some of the stories that could be worked successfully as that is up to the men who make a study of the business.

Atlanta, Ill., is to have a motion picture theatre. The proprietor is to be C. F. Weaver, who will install his show in the Shipley Building.

PERSONAL.

W. N. Selig of Chicago, Ill., spent last week in New York on business.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lang, and Mr. and Mrs. William Wright of the Kalem Co., spent Labor Day at Asbury Park, N. J.

"Pop" Rock hurried back from Chicago in time to spend Labor Day at Coney Island.

J. E. and F. W. Pearce of the firm of Josiah Pearce & Sons, New Orleans, La., were in New York last week. This firm has just completed two scenic railways, one at Blue Grass Park, Lexington, Ky., and the other at Ocean View Park, Norfolk, Va., and the young men were on a tour of inspection, taking in the metropolis en route. Josiah Pearce & Sons have constructed a number of high class amusement devices for parks in various parts of the country this season.

John Pelzer, manager of sales for the Edison Company, stopped over in Chicago while on a business tour that will occupy the month of September. Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo and Detroit were visited before Chicago was reached and before turning his face eastward all the principal cities in the Middle West will be visited. He pronounces the sales of the Edison machine "great."

NEW PICTURE THEATRE FOR ATLANTA.

Atlanta is to have another motion picture theatre to be called the Alamo theatre, which, it is said, will be one of the most up to date in the city. The permit for altering the interior of the store formerly occupied by the Schoen Shoe Co. was taken out Monday and calls for an expenditure of $10,000.

Mion Bros., who conduct a tile-setting business here are backing the theatre, and the interior will be artistically decorated in plastic work.

SOME STRONG PATHES

An Effective Linking of the West and East in Picture Plays

PATHE'S American players have produced a Western subject that is a slight variation from the usual Western picture story. It is a sort of romantic linking of the East and the West that will be appreciated. The story starts with a masque ball at which a misunderstanding arises between the girl and her lover.

SCENE FROM PATHE'S SUBJECT, "AN ARIZONA ROMANCE."

She dismisses the lover and in despair he rushes away to a ranch in the wilds of Arizona, neglecting to send the girl his address.

As the years pass the young man becomes an accomplished cowboy and gets shot in a saloon mixup while defending an Indian girl from the insults of another cowboy. The squaw takes care of the injured cowbuy till he gets well and falls in love with him, but in the course of events she discovers the locket hung from his neck which contains the picture of his former sweetheart.

She dismisses the lover and in despair he rushes away to a ranch in the wilds of Arizona, neglecting to send the girl his address.

As the years pass the young man becomes an accomplished cowboy and gets shot in a saloon mixup while defending an Indian girl from the insults of another cowboy. The squaw takes care of the injured cowbuy till he gets well and falls in love with him, but in the course of events she discovers the locket hung from his neck which contains the picture of his former sweetheart. As yet the cowboy does not get sight of his sweetheart, nor she of him, but while they are standing around someone starts up the motor. It is about to run over the white girl when the Indian girl grabs her and throws her aside and is struck by the car. As the squaw dies in the arms of the cowboy the former lovers discover each other and there is a sad though affectionate reunion.

The story is well portrayed and the scene in the saloon which is illustrated on the first page of this issue, is particularly thrilling.

THE APPEAL OF THE PRAIRIE.

The "going back" to barbarism of the educated Indian is an emergency that has troubled educators who have hoped to reclaim the red man. As a subject for a picture the Pathe American players have succeeded in getting a good picture and also in illustrating the "going back" process quite effectually. To begin with a miner has lost his way on the plains and is found dying in the desert by an Indian boy. Running a rope around the man's body the boy drags him to the village of his tribe where he is restored to health and strength.

When the miner bids goodbye to the Indians he gives the boy a ring and promises to help him if the chance should ever come.

Several years after a student from an Indian school presents himself at a banker's office for employment and is put to work. In the course of events one of the clerks attempts to steal money but is prevented by the Indian and then, to cast suspicion upon the Indian the clerk slyly places the money in his pocket. When the loss of the money is discovered the clerk intimates that the Indian has it and a search reveals it in his pocket where the clerk placed it.

SCENE FROM PATHE SUBJECT, "A SIMPLE MISTAKE."

At this point the banker is about to have the Indian arrested when he catches sight of the ring on the Indian's finger. There is an immediate recognition and a withdrawal of the charge against the Indian, whom the banker at once installs in his own home, in grateful acknowledgment for his life saved by the Indian boy years before.

It would have gone all right with the Indian, probably, if he had not made the mistake of falling in love with the banker's daughter who is a very beautiful girl, and who probably flirted with her father's protege. At any rate, the Indian got on the wrong trail and when he suggests his desire to the father he is quickly turned down. This is a set back, but when he finds the girl in the arms of the clerk who tried

A MOHAWK'S WAY

Biograph Subject of the James Fenimore Cooper Type

The Mohawk tribe of Indians are a people seldom portrayed in drama or pictures and yet no family of the red race was more prolific of romance and interesting episode. This subject tends to contrast the sincerity of this type of aborigines with the type of the white race he first came in contact with. A white doctor refuses to aid the fevered papoose of a Mohawk, but his wife ministers and cures the little one. The doctor goes further in his tyranny by offering a gross insult to the squaw. Resenting this the tribe declares war against the whites and the doctor gets his just deserts while his wife is guarded and carried to safety. The scenes were taken in the vicinity of the location of some of Cooper's tales.

The Persevering Prayers of a Brother Answered

The flesh is weak, hence avoid the occasions of temptation. The widowed father of two children—a boy and a girl—finds consolation in their love. The boy growing into manhood enters the seminary to study for the priesthood, the girl remaining to care for their father. She meets a young man from the city who impresses her to such a degree that she elopes with him only to be deceived, for he is a contemptible profligate who only makes reparation at his death by marrying her. During the years they are together she is made to suffer for her false step. After his death she starts out to make one last visit to her mother's grave and there pray for forgiveness. Here she meets her brother, now a priest. He brings her back to their old almost broken-hearted father. Approximate length, 997 feet.

to make him out a thief all his savage blood is aroused and the clerk is compelled to hide behind the girl to save his life. The Indian goes away with blood in his eye. In his room he forms a desire to kill the father of the girl and attempts to carry out that desire. As he is about to plunge his knife into his victim's body he discovers that the girl is sitting where he last saw the father. Balked in his desire far revenge he packs his bag and escapes from the house. A final glimpse of him is given in an Indian astride his horse on the plains.

Some of the "Indian sharps" will find a point to criticize now and then in this picture, but in the main the story is well and correctly told.

A SIMPLE MISTAKE.

While the above title may be the producer's idea of a proper name for his picture, the spectator will find the plot anything but simple. There are complications a plenty and things move fast and furious for a time. No printed description can meet the requirements, this picture must be seen to be appreciated. Yes, it's funny, and it is strenuous, and there is something doing all the time.

As an example of farce comedy it is one of the best that the Pathe American players have turned out to date.

NEW HOUSE FOR MUSCATINE.

Muscatine, Ia., is soon to have a large motion picture show, if the plans of Davis Brothers, owners of the large billiard hall on East Second street, materialize. They are now selling their equipment and will operate a picture show at the same location. The theatre will be far and away the largest motion picture amusement parlor in the city. Six hundred opera chairs have been ordered for the hall and arrangements will be made to accommodate a large crowd. The room will be a half block in length and 45 feet in width. A handsome lobby fifteen feet deep will be constructed and a large and showy front installed. The Davis Brothers plan to begin work on the project in the very near future and to throw the doors open to the public by October. 1.

NEW MANAGER FOR PASTIME THEATRE

R. E. Holbrook Will Look After Affairs of Popular Theatre This Season.

The Pastime Theatre at the corner of High and Main streets, Bristol, Conn., is now under new management, the new manager being R. E. Holbrook of Ansonia, who came last week to take charge. He succeeds Henry Davis of Guilford, who has returned to that town. Mr. Holbrook has long been a well known resident of New Haven and gave up a fine position to take charge of the local theatre. Robert H. Norton of Guilford is still the principal owner of the theatre, but Mr. Holbrook owns one-third of the theatre and will have charge in the future. There has been a decided improvement in every way at the theatre since Mr. Holbrook took charge a few days ago. The audiences are growing and the interest increasing wonderfully.

Mr. Holbrook says he intends to give the people of the town the best motion picture show for ten cents that it is possible for anybody to present. The programs in the future will be changed every second day, and all the latest pictures, both humorous and more substantial will be shown every week. Mr. Holbrook gives personal attention to the seating of the audience and also takes a personal interest in seeing that children and young people get good seats and are looked out for during the entertainment.

Bristol will have in the Pastime in the future a show place that will not only be a credit to the town but educational as well and a popular place to spend an evening or afternoon.

The show both afternoon and evening is of the continuous performance variety, so that patrons need not hurry to reach the show, for any time during the afternoon or evening will suffice so that people can see all the pictures exhibited.—Bristol Press.

AUDITORIUM SCENIC TEMPLE OPENS.

There was an exceptionally strong motion picture and vaudeville attraction at the opening of Auditorium Scenic Temple, Malden, Mass., Labor Day evening. The house which has been practically remodeled caused the regular patrons to sit up and take notice at all the new "doings" that had taken place during the summer months.

The opening performance was well represented by the summer visitors, and many box parties were given. Everybody seemed to enjoy the program—the pictures especially; many of the comedy films were tremendously applauded.

It is the plan of the management to open the house at 10 a. m., and run pictures up until time for the regular afternoon performance 2.30 p. m.

AN EDISON HISTORIC DRAMA

Portrayal of Deerfield Massacre in Pictures—Clever Comedy Drama Also

EVERY patriotic American is interested in the early history of his country. Stories of the hardships of the first settlers—the colonists, never fails to stir the red blood. History tells many thrilling tales of Indian raids upon defenseless settlers, battles between the colonists and the Indians, awful massacres and miraculous deliverances from death at the hands of the redskins.

At this time, hundreds of years since those events happened, these thrilling tales read like fairy stories, though none the less real. Throughout the New England States are monuments which mark the spots made immortal by the strivings of the builders of a new country—a new nation. One of these is at Deerfield, Mass., famous in history as the scene of the "Deerfield Massacre" in the year 1704 when the Indians raided the village. Another commemorates the massacre at Bloody Brook in 1675.

At the instance of Mr. Herbert B. Streeter, a motion picture exhibitor of Greenfield, Mass., the Edison Company undertook to reproduce the events mentioned. In order to give as faithful a reproduction as could be made, some time was consumed in preparation and in study of the events to be pictured, so that it is more than a year since the work was begun.

In the work the Edison Company were fortunate in securing the co-operation of Mr. George Sheldon, the ancient historian of Deerfield, now in his 92d year, and it was through his intimate knowledge of those stirring times that an accurate account of the events shown in the picture was obtained.

The picture opens with a view of the monument commemorating the massacre of Bloody Brook. Two visitors approach it and read the inscription, after which they go to the home of the historian, Mr. Sheldon, who is seen sitting in his chair conversing with them. As the venerable man tells his story the picture dissolves into the scenes of the event. To give a touch of romance to the story Ungagook, an Indian chief, and one of the party which attacked the whites at Bloody Brook, rescues Jonathan Smith from death and takes him safely to his home. Ungagook is accompanied by his young son Ononko, and when they reach Smith's home, Ungagook dies of a wound he has received in the fight, first requiring his son to promise to protect the family in whose home he dies.

Thus originates Ononko's Vow from which the title of the picture is derived, and the manner in which the vow is kept is shown in the scenes which follow and which illustrate the Deerfield Massacre which occurred 28 years later.

The picture is of educational interest since it illuminates an event in history that becomes more real after seeing the picture.

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT, "ONONKO'S VOW."

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "THE FOOTLIGHTS OR THE FARM."

THE FOOTLIGHTS OR THE FARM.

A realistic bit of theatrical life is given in the Edison comedy drama to the foregoing title. The country girl, induced by the success of a friend, decides to go to New York to begin a career as an actress. She bids good bye to her country lover and takes up her abode in the uninviting quarters of a theatrical boarding house. Then follows the wearying hunt for an engagement, and the realism of the scenes of the picture will be recognized at once by members of the profession who chance to see them.

At last an engagement is secured and gowns purchased; but when the seeker after fame presents herself for rehearsals she discovers that another has been given her part. Discouraged and disheartened she makes her way to the street and, fortunately, runs into the arms of her lover from the country who has come to look her up.

John persuades her to return home with him and there is a happy ending to this girl's theatrical aspirations.

MOTION PICTURES REOPENS CUMMINGS THEATRE.

Motion pictures and high class vaudeville reopened the Cummings theatre, Fitchburg, Mass., Tuesday night, August 23, in spite of the previous announcement that the house would play to only dramatic and musical productions during the coming season. It is now understood that the house will run both pictures and vaudeville in connection with the plays that Manager Geo. H. Hill intends booking.

It was stated while Mr. Hill was on his vacation that it was his intention of opening the season with Clyde Fitch's well known farce "Girls," but after returning he decided that the weather was too torrid for such a large attraction. At any rate Mr. Hill lost nothing by canceling the production as the house on its initial night was crowded to the doors.

During the summer the house was completely renovated and gone over and with its fresh coat of paint and other finishing touches the spectators thought they were in another place. During the season Mr. Hill will be surrounded with the same efficient staff, with the exception of Mr. Harry Quinn, the new advertising man, who comes from New Orleans.

W. C. GILL WILL BUILD TWO HOUSES.

Walter C. Gill of Walnut Beach, Conn., is planning to build two large theatres for motion picture shows, one on River street next to the Milford Ice company building and the other at Walnut Beach. The theatre on River street will be a very substantial structure and will be used during the winter. Work will be started on this one as soon as the plans have been made and the contracts given out which will be in a very short time. The one at Walnut Beach will be built in the spring and will be in readiness for the next summer.

DREAMLAND PICTURE THEATRE OPENED

Herbert V. Daley of Claremont, N. H., Shows Public a Model House.

The enlarged and remodeled Dreamland theatre in Tremont street, Claremont, N. H., owned and managed by Herbert V. Daley, Claremont's pioneer in the picture business, was opened to the public Sept. 6. The place was filled to capacity during the three performances. The theatre seats 300, and occupies with the former location the room formerly rented by F. E. Thompson. The two rooms were made into one and what was the entrance into the Thompson billiard room is now used principally as an exit. An attractive steel front marks the entrance, through two arches with the ticket office between and presenting three ticket windows, one opening directly upon the sidewalk: Easy steps lead to the parquet which slopes towards the picture screen that is placed across the northwest corner on the Crescent street side of the theatre.

The operating booth is in the opposite corner, and conveniently out of the way of the audience. Ample room at the right of the screen is left for the orchestra. The seats are regulation opera chairs of neat design. The walls and ceilings are handsomely papered, green being the dominating color, with harmonious trimmings. The lighting is ample, provided in the interior by ceiling tungstens, and the theatre presents a pleasing appearance when lighted. Rows of incandescent lamps suspended from the arches light the main entrance. Besides the exits mentioned there is one at the east side leading to either Tremont or Crescent streets. Large windows on the Tremont and Crescent streets side and electric exhaust fans, assure a perfect system of ventilation.

NEW PICTURE THEATRE FOR ST. LOUIS.

The latest motion picture and vaudeville theatre to be erected in St. Louis, Mo., will be started within the next few days. The new house will be in the northwestern part of the city and should be patronized by a first-class set of people, who are making that part of St. Louis, one of the most desirable parts of the city.

When the house is completed it is expected that the seating capacity will reach 1,650.

R. E. Holbrook, of Ansonia, Conn., has succeeded Henry Davis as manager of the Pastime theatre. The house runs licensed pictures and vaudeville.

THE NICKEL—THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL

Lawrence Picture and Vaudeville Theatre the Queen of All New England.

There is no doubt that the Nickel theatre, Lawrence, Mass., is one if not the daintiest motion picture and vaudeville houses in the whole of the New England states, and since its remodeling, it has been the wonder and talk of the vast audiences that have visited it since the opening—Labor Day evening.

During the summer, the house has been remodeled from stage to front and the old patrons, when they entered the house last week didn't hardly know the place with all its new furnishings. They found the walls tinted in olive green, the trimmings being in antique copper and the stucco work being of old ivory which causes a most harmonious effect. The ceiling is done over in old ivory with a centerpiece of blue ornamented with flowers and cupids. Everywhere you look, your eyes fall on hundreds of little electric light bulbs of many colors; these with the color scheme are enough to make one dream of the fairy tales you heard about in childhood days. In order that the theatre be thoroughly ventilated one of the most modern plants has been installed. Suction and distributing fans have been placed in all parts of the house, in order that pure air be had from pit to dome.

The house, which seats 1,700, is furnished with large, comfortable chairs, that give plenty of room to the patron. Both balconies are beautifully furnished and any one can see from all parts of the house. There are no seats placed behind posts or any other obstruction.

By James S. McQuade

SEVERAL weeks ago, I devoted some considerable space to a description of "Picture Row" in this city and felt real pleasure in pointing out to readers the location of the "Row" and in dwelling on the policy adopted by the four theatres situated on it.

Yesterday evening (Labor Day), I passed through that section of Madison street which bears the sobriquet referred to and, forgetting that the day was a holiday, I was disappointed to find the theatre fronts fairly ablaze with announcements of vaudeville entertainment that put pictures away in the background. I found, however, that this vaudeville habit on the part of the managers of the Casino Garden, the Alcazar and the Pastime includes holidays as well as Saturdays and Sundays, and that the arrangement has been mutually assented to by the various managers at the beginning of the Summer season.

Today, Tuesday, September 6, I again passed through the "Row" and found that, while the Casino Garden and the Alcazar had pictures solely for entertainment, the Pastime still featured vaudeville as the chief attraction and that it will continue to do so throughout the week.

Now while I make it a point never to put my nose in another man's business—and I do not intend to do so in this instance—yet I feel that it is my right, as well as my duty, to write a word on this slighting, or apparent slighting, of pictures. I write "slighting" with a special emphasis, for, in the present issue, moving pictures are not brought into competition with "high class" vaudeville but with "cheap" vaudeville.

There are only two theatres in Chicago that can rightfully claim the distinction of running "high class" vaudeville; namely, the Majestic and the American Music Hall, and at these houses are to be found the cream of that profession. The weekly payroll at each of these houses, for vaudeville artists alone, will easily cover the outlay made by a picture theatre manager for "cheap" vaudeville, for a period of 20 or 25 weeks, or, perhaps, even longer. The former houses can afford to contract with the best vaudeville talent, because they charge high prices of admission and have large seating capacities, besides having the additional advantage of being able to offer a long continuous season by reason of an extensive circuit of first class houses, which enables them to get the best talent at the minimum contract price. And it appears that, even with the best vaudeville talent obtainable, the managers of first class vaudeville theatres do not consider their bills complete without the picture.

In this connection, it will be pertinent to state that there is really no conflict between high class vaudeville and moving pictures; for both forms of entertainment have come to stay. Theatre goers have already clearly shown that they go to a strictly first class vaudeville house to see vaudeville. And that they go to a strictly first class picture house to see pictures. This has been demonstrated repeatedly by personal observation. A party attending a vaudeville performance can often be seen to go out at the end of the last act. They do not wait to see the picture subject that closes the program and, as a rule, the members of such a party can be heard to say, "Let us go to a moving picture theatre, where we can see an entire show."

It is very different in the case of the theatre that offers "cheap" vaudeville. The manager of such a house is never willing to take chances on it alone. He knows that the entertainment is weak and that it alone will fail to hold or satisfy his patrons. He uses pictures as a prop. But he forgets that "cheap" vaudeville and the moving picture will never assimilate. One is born of incompetency, as a rule, and appeals to the groundling and the ignorant; the other—the moving picture—is the offspring of science and art and it captures the untutored while, at the same time, it delights the cultured and intelligent.

No educated man or woman can tolerate "cheap" vaudeville; therefore they avoid the house where it is brought into contact with the high class moving picture and seek the theatre where they can view the pictures by themselves.

In the evolution of moving picture exhibitions, the time will surely come when the real, live, intelligent exhibitor will discard "cheap" vaudeville and bank his success solely on pictures, aided by a fine orchestra and singing and musical acts of as high merit as his receipts will permit.

Too many so-called picture exhibitors at the present time judge of the wishes and desires of their patrons by their own personal preferences. The ideal provider of entertainment is the man who can sense the preferences of his audiences, and whose continual object is to please them, gain their confidence and bind them securely to his following.

The time has passed when licensed pictures can be made to serve as the tail of the "cheap" vaudeville kite. They form an eminently successfully flying machine by themselves; and so every up-to-date picture exhibitor will find them. And he will find, too, that "cheap" vaudeville is too heavy a load for any tail to make it successful as a flyer.

Moving pictures are making wonderful strides these days, not only in their special field as an amusement factor, but in every domain where their utility can be made serviceable to humanity. We know that several great railroads and many industries have been making use of them for advertising and educational purposes, and now we learn that the Canadian Pacific Railroad is about to employ them in a manner that is certain to meet with instant favor from all who travel over that line.

The new departure in passenger traffic, soon to be adopted by this railroad, is none other than a theatre car, specially built and equipped for the exhibition of moving pictures on trans-continental trains. The following despatch, recently sent out from Montreal, and published in a St. Johns, N. B. paper, gives an account of the innovation and shows that the Edison Company of New York has figured prominently in the preparations:

"The Canadian Pacific Railway officials will some time in the near future have up for their consideration a scheme which will be entirely new in passenger train perfection. It is proposed to have motion pictures in a special theatre car on the trans-continental trains in the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

"By means of these moving pictures, it is expected to serve a double purpose. It will give travellers an idea of the world-famous scenery through which they are passing but cannot see during the night, and will at the same time advertise the company and the Dominion. Thus when darkness comes, the travellers will repair to the theatre car, where they will see in an hour or two the most interesting things and places through which they will pass during the whole night.

"The pictures will also be reproduced in the principal centres of Great Britain and the United States, and other countries, and with others showing the daylight rides will give outsiders an excellent idea of the greatness of Canada. The work is being done by the Edison Company.

AMID ANTARCTIC SNOWS

An Early Kleine Release Made by Urban-Eclipse

James S. McQuade

IT is always a pleasure to view an Urban-Eclipse educational film, whether it be a scenic or a scientific subject. In either case it is certain to capture the complete attention of the spectator and carry him out of his immediate surroundings into active participation of the scenes and incidents depicted.

The latest treat prepared by the Urban-Eclipse people, and which will be released by George Kleine in the near future, is the visualization of Dr. Jean Charcot's recent Antartic expedition, which occupied nearly two years.

Dr. Charcot is a prominent member of the medical profession in Paris and an experienced bacteriologist. He is more widely known as a scientific and intrepid explorer, who has made the unknown tracts of the Antarctic his especial field.

The expedition in the Pourquoi Pas? (Why Not?), which left Havre, August 15, 1908, and returned in the Spring of 1910, is the subject of the 425 foot film under discussion. This was his second expedition, his first being made in the Francais, in 1903-05. In his first voyage he carried out an expedition along the west coast of Graham Land, south of Cape Horn, wintering on Wandel Island (65° S. lat.). That expedition was notable chiefly for the scientific observations made and for the collections secured in the departments of hydrography, terrestrial magnetism, biology, botany and geology.

The second voyage in the Pourquoi Pas? was intended to extend the work done in the first. The program contemplated another cruise among the islands of the west coast of Graham Land, whence it was hoped to continue the voyage westward, in the direction of King Edward VII Land. It was also proposed to make excursions southwards to investigate the character of the supposed Antarctic continent, for which purpose a number of specially designed motor sledges was carried on board, and which experience afterwards proved were useless in attempting to penetrate that bleak and unknown region.

Dr. Charcot's expedition in the Pourquoi Pas? was liberally subsidized by the French Government, $120,000 being granted. The vessel, a barkentine, with an auxiliary engine of 550 h. p., was specially built for the voyage. The French Naval Department, the Paris Museum and the Prince of Monaco contributed to the scientific equipment. The scientific staff (in addition to Dr. Charcot) was comprised of specialists in hydrography, oceanography, meteorology, tidal and chemical observations, geology and glaciology, natural history and terrestrial magnetism.

The launching of the Pourquoi Pas? took place at St. Malo, France, May 18, 1908 and, as already stated, the departure from Havre was made in the middle of August, the same year. In December of that year, the vessel left Punta Arenas, Chili, and took on coal some time later at Deception Island (60° S.), in the South Shetland Islands, well known as an important meeting place for whaling vessels.

Resuming the voyage, the Pourquoi Pas? ran aground and, after being refloated, lost her rudder in collision with icebergs. The voyage was continued, however, to Adelaide Island (67° S.), and the adjacent coasts were explored for a distance of 120 miles to Alexander Island. Being unable to find safe anchorage, the expedition steamed northward and spent the Antarctic winter of 1909 off Petermann Island, near 65° S. lat.

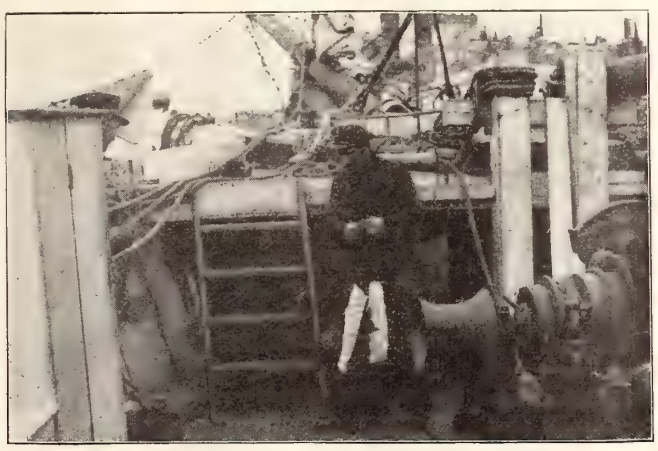
Here, though attacked by scurvy and other diseases, the explorers engaged in several excursions and carefully studied the glaciology of the region. Summer returning, they again sailed southwards and succeeded in reaching Peter I. Island (69° S.), afterwards extending the voyage, between the 69th and 71st parallel, to long. 126° W., in which region King Edward VII Land lies.

Graham Land projects northward from the Antarctic circle like a great tongue, with numerous adjacent islands; but its connection with the Antarctic continent is still uncertain. No continuous coast of this continent has been traced; but, here and there, stray patches of land—or what looks like land—have been sighted.

The value of Dr. Charcot's expedition in the Pourquoi Pas? in a geographical sense, consists in the work he has been able to do in linking up and defining more clearly the character of these stray patches of coast. The most valuable feature of the results will probably be shown to lie (the full account has not yet been published) in the scientific data collected along

DR. JEAN CHARCOT (ON LEFT OF PICTURE).

ICE BOUND.



GETTING INTO SHIP SHAPE.

GETTING SNOW FOR THE BOILERS.

magnetic, meteorological, hydrographical and geological lines.

From the foregoing it can be seen under what trying circumstances the greater number of these pictures (that will soon be offered to the public at a ridiculously low admission price) were taken. For nearly two years the producer was cut off from civilization, subject to all the perils and rigors of frozen seas and a trying climate. Dread disease, too, was faced and the climatic conditions often made it impossible to take advantage of the splendid subjects which Nature offered, for that sensitive film, manufactured in temperate climes, is susceptible to many changes when subjected to an Antarctic winter.

It would make interesting reading were the Urban producer of this short film to write the story of his trials, difficulties and tribulations on this voyage. Doubtless he would tell us, among many engrossing details, that he had used many thousands of feet of film in taking pictures, and yet all he has to show for his two years' work is a reel of 425 feet! Think of the persistence, patience, suffering and innumerable disappointments exhibited and undergone! And we can sit in our cosy theatres and view the result of it all in a few minutes, for an outlay of a few pennies!

The first picture is a scene of the launching of the Pourquoi Pas?, at St. Malo, and the second shows the departure from Havre. The third gives us a glimpse of the pier at Punta Arenas, Chili, where numerous visitors are viewing the vessels. Then civilization is left behind and we are heading towards the South Pole.

A most impressive, natural spectacle is now viewed for the first time by millions of us. It is that of an icefield where countless floes—broken here and there by fissures, through which the waters swirl and rush upwards crested with foam—heave and swell with the steadiness of a heart-beat. How many of us have had any true conception of the great unrest that prevails on a frozen sea, before having viewed this picture? The chillness of Death, and the very pulsation of Life are here in close embrace!

PENGUINS.

AN ICE SEA.

Next we are ashore—or what seems to be a shore—with a landing and sledding party, and see the attempt at coasting which is not at all satisfactory to the participants. And then we see how they get water for use abroad the ship. Men shovel snow into a large bucket, which is conveyed to the ship on a wire cable, rigged up for the purpose.

And finally we have a real comedy scene, in which penguins are the actors. The camera man has evidently gotten up close to these remarkable birds, for they are seen—thousands of them—in seeming conversation, love-making and whatnot. No one can view them without hearty laughter—inward or otherwise. Now they have evidently heard or spied the intruder, for off they scurry, just like waddling little men and women.

As is known to the reader, the penguin is a bird with small wings, but is unable to fly. The total want of quills in these wings of theirs is the most conspicuous character of these bird comedians. The wings are incapable of flexure, and move freely at the shoulder. They are really more like flippers than anything else, and are very useful as paddles when the bird is in the water, where they are worked alternately with a sort of rotary action. The breast and the under side of the wings are white, while the back is black. The legs are placed far back on the body, so that the bird is always seen standing straight up when viewed on the ice or land. The plumage which covers the whole body, consists not of real feathers, but of small scale-like feathers, many of which have only a simple shaft without the barbs. The penguin moults its plumage much as a snake sheds its skin, and not like the bird proper.

Old and young will be delighted with this film, and exhibitors should feature it well in advance, both on the screen and in newspapers, if possible. A special Saturday matinee for children, at which this film would be featured, should give splendid results. The principals of public schools, it seems to me, could be interested so as to announce the importance of this subject to their pupils, and an intelligent lecture, well delivered, will be highly in order during the exhibition.

I beg to acknowledge indebtedness to "Nature," in its issue of February 17, 1910, for the data in this article on the Charcot expedition.

CUNNINGHAM'S NEW "EAGLE."

Handsome Picture Theatre Opens at Fredonia, Kan.—Up-to-the-Minute.

The handsome "Eagle" theatre of Cunningham's, at Fredonia, Kan., will open about the 5th of September. The structure of attractive design and appointments is fitted up with every convenience and comfort for its patrons. The seating capacity of four hundred is amply provided for in a spacious theatre tastefully decorated in green and tan colors, and illuminated with electric clusters. The pitch of the floor is decidedly pronounced to give excellent lines of sight from every point in the theatre. Every precaution has been taken against fire, and a particular study has been given the machine room, which is isolated and ventilated in such a manner as to eliminate any possible danger in this part of the building.

The front, of bold and somewhat spectacular design, is in keeping with the purpose of the building, and is agreeably decorated in two tones of white and gold. The doors being paneled with large oval mirrors. The large eagle, the national bird, from which the theatre was named, is erected very neatly on the top of the ticket booth. The exits are all spacious and conveniently arranged, and the acoustics of the theatre have been pronounced a distinct success.

No effort has been spared on the part of the management to look after the comfort and convenience of the patrons of this theatre. The seats are the best in the opera line, extremely comfortable, being wide and roomy. The stage is 20 by 30 feet—large enough for a small play.

The color scheme of the house is mahogany woodwork to match the chairs and piano, against green and tan walls, the ceiling being in cream brown tan and green. This handsome place will be the finest of its kind to be found in the smaller cities of Kansas. Each performance will consist of three thousand feet of moving pictures and illustrated song. The pictures will change three times a week, Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The price of admission will be five and ten cents.

MOTION PICTURES TO TEACH MOTHERS.

In the health campaign being waged in Philadelphia and many other cities to teach ignorant mothers how to take proper care of their babies motion pictures promise soon to play an important part. They have been used by the Women's Imperial Health Association of Great Britain and the persons who have charge of the campaign in Philadelphia are about to adopt the system. For several months nurses have been going among the poor in Philadelphia and giving instructions to them as to how to care for their babies in warm weather. This campaign will be kept up and pictures will be introduced. One series of pictures shows how to wash a baby; another how to dust a room; how to dress the baby properly, and also what to do in case of accidents, such as cuts and other injuries. Furthermore, there will be mottoes for health put on the screen, such as "Keep the windows open day and night," "Breathe through the nose, keeping the mouth shut," and "Work, but do not worry."

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright Applied for.
All Rights Reserved.

SYNOPSIS OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 2.—The Ohm is the unit for measuring resistance in electric circuits and machines.

Resistance is that property in a wire or other material which opposes a movement of any kind and is generally applied to represent the friction in an electric wire and the resistance should be kept as low as possible in order to reduce the heat loss and consequent expense for electric power uselessly wasted.

The Kilowatt Hour is the unit of measurement for electric power, and is the product of the voltage multiplied by the amperes for all direct current systems.

Our next talk will begin with further discussion of the Kilowatt together with standard formulas for electrical calculations in simplified form.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 3

Kilowatt Hour.

IN our last talk, I gave you a few examples illustrating the value of a Kilowatt Hour. Before going into further details as to how to figure kilowatt hours from voltage and amperes, I will give you further explanation.

Suppose you hire a man capable of pumping sufficient water to fill a tank on your roof, and that it takes this man working with normal power and exertion, 10 hours to do the work, and you pay the man $1.50 or 15 cents per hour. At that rate you are paying 15 cents for each man hour. If you wanted to do this same work in one hour's time, you would have to put in 10 pumps, employ 10 men and at the rate of 15 cents per hour, the total expense would be just $1.50, but you would have the work done in just 1-10 of the time and the only extra expense to you would be the investment for the 9 extra pumps providing you could get the 10 men just when you want them.

It is generally agreed that one man power equals about ⅛ to ¼ horse power depending upon the length of time the man is compelled to work.

In other words, a man can produce about ⅛ horse-power continuously for 10 hours. It is, of course, understood that he may have to rest for a while, but no man can produce ¼ horse-power continuously, only for a period of ½ hour, unless in exceptional cases.

We have learned that one horse-power equals about ¾ K. W., but allowing for all losses in the motor and the belt it takes about one K. W. hour to produce one horse-power. Therefore, ⅛ of a horse-power would require just ⅛ of a K. W. or 125 watts per hour.

If we put an electric motor on the above-mentioned pump, it would consume about 125 watts per hour, which for 10 hours would be 1,250 watts or 1¼ K. W., which at the 10c. rate would represent an expense for current of $1.25. This ⅛ horse-power motor would have to run steady for 10 hours to do the work, and you understand, of course, that the electric light company would have to furnish boiler, engine, dynamo, feed wires, transformer and meter just large enough to drive this ⅛ horse-power motor and that the electric company would furnish you this quantity of power in 10 hours' time giving them a good, steady load at the expense of $1.25 per 10 hours.

Now, if you want to do this work in one hour, you would have to put in about 1¼ horse-power motor and you can readily understand that the electric light company would have to put in much larger electric generating equipment in order to supply you and at the same 10c. rate for current, the income to the electric company would be just about $1.25, but the expense would be much greater because the company has to invest more money and run a bigger plant if you want your work done all in one hour.

The above is the reason for the electric company in many places charging according to the number of hours you use your installation; therefore, when you put in your equipment you must do it in such a way that you have the smallest possible amount of installation or, as I might call it, "demand" on the electric company's service, in order to secure the lowest rate. The current saver for the motion picture machine lamp cuts your demand in half, not only cutting your old bill 50 per cent., but in some instances also reducing the rate, if the electric company has a rate on the sliding scale, as many of them have.

We all know that it costs more to put up a building in two months than to put it up in six months, because rush work means more expense in every way, and I want to impress this on your mind, because in laying out the electric equipment for theatres, considerable reduction can be made in the current consumption as well as in the rate, especially if the company has a sliding scale of rates. I have deemed it advisable to give you the foregoing example, because you must realize and understand these fundamental principles, and any time you spend at familiarizing yourself with the above will save you a great deal of misunderstanding and expense and it will also give you a clear idea of why the electric lighting company charges different rates for different classes of service.

To come back to your particular installation as a comparison and a standard of values, I will say that:

One sixteen candlepower carbon filament lamp takes about 50 watts per hour.

One regular enclosed arc lamp takes about 500 watts per hour.

One 4,000 candlepower flaming arc lamp takes about 500 watts per hour.

One 12-inch fan motor takes about 50 watts per hour.

One 16-inch fan motor takes about 100 watts per hour.

One ceiling fan takes about 125 watts.

One 18-inch exhaust fan about 250 watts per hour.,

One 24-inch exhaust fan about 400 watts per hour.

One 36-inch exhaust fan about 1,000 watts per hour, or 1 K. W.

One ordinary moving picture lamp on direct current with rheostat on 110 volts takes about 3,300 watts per hour, or 3 3-10 K. W. This same M. P. lamp on 220 volts takes 6,600 watts or 6 6-10 K. W. per hour.

One M. P. lamp with rheostat on alternating current 110 volt circuit takes 4,500 watts or 4 5-10 K. W. per hour. This same lamp on 220 volts takes 9,000 watts, or 9 K. W. per hour.

Keeping the above in mind, you can easily figure for yourself how many Watts or K. W. your installation requires.

For the electrician and operator as well as the manager or proprietor who may be interested, the following data and formulas are of great value in figuring voltage, amperes, resistance and watts.

FORMULA NO. 1.

$$C = \frac{E}{R}$$

The above is the electrical designation or formula for figuring the number of amperes which will pass through a rheostat when you know the voltage and the number of ohms of your rheostat. For instance, if you have a line voltage of 100 and your rheostat has a resistance of 5 ohms and you want to find out how many amperes will pass through the rheostat, the formula extended in simplified form will read:

Amperes equals $\frac{100 \text{ volts}}{5 \text{ ohms}}$, or, written out: 100 volts divided by 5 ohms equals 20 amperes, and this is the amount of current you would get through your rheostat, which would, in that case, be nothing more than an electric heater taking 20 amperes from the 100 volt line.

FORMULA NO. 2.

$$R = \frac{E}{C}.$$

The above is the electrical designation or formula for figuring the number of ohms for resistance required in your rheostat when you know the line voltage and the number of amperes required for your work. For instance, if you have 100 volts and you require 20 amperes for your work, the formula in simplified form reads as follows:

Resistance in ohms of rheostat equals $\frac{100 \text{ volts}}{20 \text{ amperes}}$, or written out: 100 volts divided by 20 amperes equals 5 ohms, which is the resistance required in your rheostat.

FORMULA NO. 3.

$$E = C \times R$$

The above is the electrical designation or formula for figuring the number of volts required to force a certain number of amperes through a rheostat of given resistance. For instance, if you have a flow of 20 amperes through a rheostat offering a resistance of 5 ohms, the formula in simplified form reads as follows:

Voltage equals 20 amperes x 5 ohms, or written out: 20 amperes times 5 ohms equals 100 volts. In other words, it would take just 100 volts to force 20 amperes through a rheostat having a resistance of 5 ohms.

FORMULA NO. 4.

$$W = C \times E.$$

The above is the electrical designation or formula for figuring the number of watts which will be delivered by a given voltage and flow of amperes on a direct current and for alternating current where the load is made up of only "ohmic" resistance. In other words, it cannot be used correctly for alternating current where motors, arc lamps and current savers are used, as such a load has in addition to "ohmic" resistance, what is called "inductive" resistance. For instance, if you have on direct current system a flow of 20 amperes and the

TWO NEW ESSANAY COMEDIES

"A FLIRTY AFFLICTION" and "CURING A MASHER"

BEGINNING this week the Essanay Company issues the first picture of their Hank and Lank series which we have every reason to believe should prove immensely popular just now when there has been some complaint of the scarcity of good comedy subjects. The Hank and Lank idea is a new one and with the promise of the appearance of these two characters in new adventures nearly every Wednesday ought to establish a desire by every exhibitor and his patrons to see the following numbers.

SCENE FROM ESSANAY SUBJECT "A FLIRTY AFFLICTION."

This week we are introduced to Hank and Lank in the filmlet called "Hank and Lank-Joyriding," a description of which will be found in other columns of this paper. It is released as a filler with a Western dramatic story "The Pony Express Rider" on Sept. 17, The following releases are "Hank and Lank—Dude Up Some" and another, booked for early release is a convulsingly funny picture in which "Hank and Lank—Get Wise to a New Scheme." This picture is said to be a real prize-winner among the Hank and Lank pictures now ready for release.

Undoubtedly Hank and Lank will be popular and once the picture public are acquainted with them they will prove favorites with the picture people.

The Essanay Guide for Sept. 15 to 30 is an attractive little booklet with a novel cover design and an excellent program. There are two Western pictures one of which is a racing play with many exciting scenes and a pretty love theme. The booklet contains descriptions of two Hank and Lank pictures and three other excellent comedy subjects. Two of these are worthy of special mention.

"A Flirty Affliction" is a novelty in the lighter vein with a decidedly clever idea and many uproariously funny situations. A young lady is afflicted with a peculiar nervous disease affecting the muscles of her neck and throat and causing her to throw back her head in a way resembling a person beckoning to another.

She consults a nerve specialist who gives her a treatment but apparently no help for as she leaves the office the unruly muscles of her neck work again and a young man with a broken arm thinks she is flirting with him and goes out after her.

She goes to a drug store to have the prescription filled and the young druggist is also puzzled for as she leaves the place she unmistakably invites him to go along with her.

She enters a restaurant and causes a good deal of confusion among the men guests even the waiter flattering himself that she has deigned to notice him.

Of course by the time she arrives home she has quite a following of male admirers who insist that she must let them into the house but she is finally rescued by a kindly policeman who drives off her unwelcome suitors. As she turns to enter the house she throws back her head in the same peculiar manner and the policeman, thinking that his protection had won him favor with the girl, accepts the invitation. However, the patrol sergeant comes on the scene and sends the discourteous subordinate about his business. The film ends when the girl despairingly slams the door in the Sergeant's face after he had consented to be entertained by her.

SCENE FROM ESSANAY SUBJECT "CURING A MASHER."

"Curing a Masher" is something with as good a moral and just as many humorous situations. A young chap with a conceited opinion of his charms endeavors to flirt with a half dozen young ladies but is turned down by all except a young married woman who has thought up a scheme to make use of the worthless fellow. When he approaches her with his smirks and bows she at first declines but after long persistence she allows him to accompany her on her way home.

The following scenes are genuinely funny. The young woman tells her escort she must make a few purchases and invites him to accompany her. A large bucket and a dozen heavy flatirons is the first. She buys a lawn-mower, a garden hose, a new hat and a foot tub and making him pay for them, also refuses to allow them to be delivered.

When they arrive at the young woman's apartments, after climbing four flights of stairs the masher is a perspiring wreck. A fitting climax comes when she introduces him to her husband, a strapping big fellow in a sweater and a pair of boxing gloves. The masher loses no time in getting out of the house and an hour later when a young woman endeavors to force her attentions upon him he throws up his hands and runs.

"Curing a Masher" is a snappy comedy with a witty story and cleverly acted. It is released Sept. 28, with the Hank and Lank film "Hank and Lank—Dude Up Some."

THE ESSANAY INDIAN HEAD POSTER.

A new advertising novelty for the lobbies of the motion picture theatre is advertised by the Essanay Company, of which a half tone facsimile appears above. The subject of the poster placard is the Essanay Indian Head and the purpose of the poster is obvious. As an adornment to the lobby, as an inexpensive and attractive advertising feature, and as means of announcing the Essanay Indian Head films, it is certainly worth the small price the Essanay Company are asking for it.

This poster placard is a handsome lithograph, in many colors and tints, and a thoroughly artistic creation. The lithograph is mounted on a heavy card more than ¼-inch thick. It is weather proof and may clean and will not crack or break. The size of the card is 22 x 28 inches.

The Essanay Company have issued over 9,000 facsimiles of their Indian Head poster placard which contain the same colors as the large card offered for sale. To say the least it is exceedingly beautiful and should prove an excellent advertising feature.

The card is sold at 25 cents each by Poster Dept. B, Essanay Film Mfg. Co., 435 N. Clark street, Chicago, Ill.

PICTURES STAY IN SOUTH PASADENA.

The City Council of South Pasadena, Cal., received a rather hard jolt from the business men of that city last week, when they signed a petition in favor of motion picture theatres being allowed to run. Recently, the council thought they would make a vital move toward driving the picture shows out of town by getting the City Attorney to draw an ordinance prohibiting them to run.

When the ordinance was made public there was certainly a big kick made by all the prominent business men, who immediately came forward to help the picture managers. The merchants claim that such an ordinance would be restraining trade and that the picture houses provided the only amusement for the poorer classes, and that so long as they were run in a straight, legitimate manner it was a petty thing for any city council to try and prohibit them.

"WHIST."—Mrs. Henry Blink decides to give a whist party and does so. The guests arrive and are soon occupied in this most profound sport. Suddenly from across the courtway comes the crashing, ear-splitting crescendos from Schopheimer or somebody's melody in G flat. It happens to be Professor Porfiro, an earnest student of the piano, polishing up the ivories.

The first strains bring groans from the whist players, and all agree that the pianist across the hall is a nuisance. Blink resolves to put a stop to it, and arming himself with a few choice Havanas steps around the corridor to the professor's room. The others across the court watch with interest the animated discussion and sigh relievedly when the musician accepts the weeds, lights one and settles down with his back to the piano.

Silence reigns again and the game has progressed to where Blink is about to sweep the board clear when—horror of horrors—a sound like the wailing of a lost soul drags itself out on the night air! Blink again rises and again goes to reconnoitre. He locates the clatter at last, which comes from the trombone of Willie Wilts, another occupant across the court. In much the same manner Willie is silenced, and the whist players go on with their game.

There are other repetitions of musical interruptions when Fritz Spielhouser, a clarinetist, and lastly Sandy McPherson, a short, stout Scotchman, starts the "Blue Bells of Scotland" on their squeaky instruments.

Sandy absolutely refuses to lay aside his beloved instrument for the cigars and indicates that he prefers his pipe. Blink scratches his head and tells Sandy he'll be back with something he may like.

In a short time he returns with a bottle of Scotch whiskey, and Sandy's eyes light. In a short time, with a glass between them, they have become most agreeable, while Blink, under the warming influence of the Scotch, has quite forgotten his social duties.

Blink finally suggests that they find the other musicians and organize an orchestra. This is effected, and the whist players, who have despaired of Blink ever returning, and who have returned to their cards, are suddenly startled by the blaring of brass, the thrumming of stringed instruments and the squeaking of reeds and wind pipes.

The catastrophe comes when Mrs. Blink, suspicious of what may have happened to her spouse, hurries with resolute step to the apartment of Professor Porfiro. Her suspicions are confirmed. Blink is not under the table, but on it, with a glass of Scotch in one hand, the bottle in the other, and an "Ip-i-yaddy-i-ay" on his lips.

A description of her treatment of Blink will be reserved until you see the film.

"HE MET THE CHAMPION."—Willie Nutt, an aspirant to athletic honors, thinks he sees some easy money when he reads Professor Brawn's notice in the lobby of a theater offering $100 to anyone who will put him on his back.

Willie resolves to make a try, and passing a book store observes in the window a volume labeled "How to Wrestle." No sooner seen than bought, and Willie immediately goes into training. Willie reads the book as he walks home, and becomes interested in the passage, "grab your opponent by the calf of the left leg and force him on his knee." Willie wants to experiment, and a passing Chinaman, with a bundle of wash on his back, is the victim. The two are soon struggling together, and a lively match ensues until the Chinaman breaks away and runs down the street yelling "murder" and "police."

Willie's next victim is an automobilist, stretched out under his machine, hammering at a loose bolt. Willie drags the chauffeur from under the machine, throws down a blanket for a mat and proceeds to lay about the surprised fellow for all he is worth. The autoist resents the attack, however, and Willie is somewhat the worse for the encounter when he is kicked on his way.

Willie's other victims are a chap scrubbing a walk, a woman beating a carpet and a young fellow washing windows. Willie gets off comparatively easy with the two former, but when the window washer gets him he hurls him through the window onto a dining table, demolishing an excellent repast. He does not linger long, however, but is hurled out the window again, bruised and sore.

After other adventures, Willie feels he has had suffcient training and goes to the theater to meet the champion. When the usual invitation is extended the audience Willie is on his feet and with his valuable book in his hand he goes to meet the champion.

The following scene is one of the funniest ever. Willie constantly consults his book, and is an easy mark for the big wrestler. The latter finally takes him by the neck, hurls him around his head several times and deposits him on the mat, flat on his back. After some time Willie is able to arise and then and there makes the solemn resolve: "Never again!"

"HANK AND LANK."—In this instance our friend Hank, the little fellow with the big ideas, longs for an auto ride and communicates to Lank a plan by which they may obtain one. The suggestion he offers is this: They will spot a good car and when the chauffeur is near Hank will throw a fit and the sympathetic Lank will induce the chauffeur to take his stricken friend to the hospital.

The scheme works perfectly. Hank approaches the car, is suddenly stricken, and doubles up spasmodically in an awful epileptic fit. Lank is the first on the scene and waves violently to the driver of the car. This latter proves sympathetic and offers to get Hank to the hospital with all possible speed.

In another moment Hank is ensconced in the soft, pillowy leather and enjoying the sport like a millionaire. But as they near the gates of the hospital Hank has thought twice and leaps out of the machine unbeknownst to the driver, who hurries on, supposedly with his sick man.

Later he finds Lank and tells him about the joy ride. Lank is enthusiastic and anxious to try the scheme himself. They locate another car and Lank goes through with his stunt. Unfortunately for him, however, the machine they have chosen is that of a doctor, and when this latter examines Lank he quickly discovers that the tall fellow is shamming.

Without the least hint of being hep, the M. D. hurries out his medicine case and doses the unfortunate Lank with the bitterest herbs in the pharmacopaeia. But this is not enough, and with the aid of the chauffeur he holds Lank prostrate on the ground and reaches for his surgical bag. The sight of a long, treacherous-looking knife is enough, however, to induce Lank that he is not sick, and breaking from the M. D. and his assistant he beats it wildly down the street, while Hank looks on, hugely enjoying the joke.

"THE PONY EXPRESS RIDER."—"Pony" O'Brien, or Number 3 of the relay between two desert bound Western cities, draws his horse before his sweetheart's house and lingers somewhat longer with his packet of mail as he tells her the good news of a raise in salary which means they will soon be ready to marry. The girl is delighted and her father, coming on the scene, congratulates them and gives them his blessing.

"Pony" is hardly on his way again when Jim Allison, a puncher employed by Holmes, the girl's father, approaches Mary and hesitatingly asks her to marry him. At the girl's refusal and her confession that she is already engaged, Allison turns angrily on his heel, fully resolved to leave the ranch. He looks up the old man and tells him his intentions. Holmes coolly hands him his pay and asks for no explanation. Allison, he believes, is not trustworthy, and his going is good riddance.

Some time later Allison is stopped by two highwaymen, ordered to dismount and is dragged of by them through a winding, rocky defile which ends abruptly in a small cavern. Entering the cavern, Allison makes out in the uncertain light the vague figures of a half dozen men who spring to their feet and draw their revolvers. The appearance of the other two, however, puts them at ease, and their attitude of defense gives way to curiosity.

Allison soon learns that the leader of the gang is "Red" Batterson, a bandit, whose name is the terror of every household in the vicinity. Batterson asks him to choose between death and loyalty to the gang, and Allison chooses the latter.

The next day the bandit puts him to test by ordering him to "get" "Pony" O'Brien, the express rider. Allison mounts his horse and rides away, fixing his destination at the post station where he knows "Pony" will make his start on the long ride through the mountains. "Pony" is soon seen to mount his horse, while Allison watches and sets out cautiously on his trail.

At a lonely place in the mountains he overtakes the rider, orders him from his horse and viciously knocks him senseless with the butt of his pistol. A second later, with the express rider's bag, he mounts his horse and tears down the trial to the rendezvous of the bandits.

Batterson is pleased with the success of his new recruit, but is doubly surprised when this latter, opening the flap of the mail bag, sees something which causes him to suddenly change his purpose. Quick as a flash he draws his revolver and with the surprised crowd covered he backs out of the den, leaps on his horse and rides away.

He finds the rider still unconscious by the side of the road, and hurrying off through the bushes brings back his hat full of water, which soon revives him. "Pony" mechanically feels for his gun, but the other man waves it back. "I want that picture of Mary," he says, indicating the photo of Mary, pasted inside the rider's bag flap. Then he goes on to explain his love for the girl, his rejection by her and his short career as a bandit. He don't want to go bad; he wants the picture of Mary to keep him straight.

"Pony" gives him the picture, stretches out his hand, and then the two part.

ness that guests and servants neglect their business to listen. In the Street: Here, by the power of his voice, he commands vehicles and buildings at his will. "POEMS IN PICTURES."—The very title appeals to both sentiment and imagination is the euphonious alliteration employed to give a name to an exquisitely artistic film, soon to be released by George Kleine and bearing the Gaumont trade mark.

I know that the title appealed to me in an impressive way and, furthermore, that it led me to expect a great deal from the film. In this, I am glad to say, I was not disappointed, as the production of each of the five picture poems on the reel has been made with fine artistic judgment and a true poetic conception of the requirements, both of environment and of the characters.

I am convinced that the Gaumont producer of these pictures was fully aware of the fact that the moving picture has the power to express far more vividly the sentiment of poetry and to excite far more delightfully the pleasures of the intellect than has the masterpiece of a great painter. The latter has only pose and colors to take the place of "musical and moving words," whereas the moving picture has graceful, fascinating life-action. The play of a smile on mouth and cheek and eye and its gradual effacement by the outward signs of some other emotion is clearly seen in the picture, while it is impossible in the work of the most famous painter. And the delicate coloring of the scenes in these pictures under examination succeeds in heightening the pleasure derived from viewing them.

The five picture poems of the series have, in order, "Love," "Bereavement," "Friendship," "Meeting and Parting" and "War" as the subjects. Three of these are pastoral, namely, the first, third and fourth. "Love" is in the form of an eclogue; "Friendship" is purely pastoral, while "Meeting and Parting" forms an idyll.

The reader will understand, of course, that a pastoral poem treats of scenes and incidents in rural, or country life, as apart from community, or city life, and that the characters in the earliest forms of this composition were shepherds, due to the fact that the primitive occupation of the dwellers in the country was that of tending to flocks and herds of sheep and cattle. He will understand, too, that an eclogue is a choice, picked selection from pastoral poems and that an idyll is a short, highly wrought, descriptive pastoral poem, in which the episodes, or circumstances, are of rural simplicity and coloring. And so, with these few words of introduction, let us view the pictures.

All these scenes are beautifully colored and the photography is excellent. The characters, too, are cleverly enacted. The effect produced by seeing the pictures for the first time is likely to be one of regret that they cannot at once be repeated. I believe in this case, that patrons will consider it a boon should exhibitors run the reel off for the second time, say after an appropriate song has been sung to afford a short interlude. The reel is only 400 feet in length, but it has so much of beauty, art and satisfying merit that one cannot grasp its full meaning and worth at one showing.

"A DUMMY IN DISGUISE."—A rogue is passing a tailor's shop, when he is suddenly struck with the idea of taking a dummy's place outside the shop—he stands beside the other dummies—closing up time arrives, and he is carried in without being discovered. When everyone has gone home, he steals out, breaks open the safe, till, etc., pocketing all the money he can find—unfortunately, he cannot get out, the door being locked on the outside. When the morning arrives he is put outside the shop again, and many amusing scenes take place, in most of which poor dummy finds himself in a very bad plight. Finally, he is discovered and marched off to the police station, where he receives his just punishment.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"THE ARTISAN," OR "COMRADES' SELF-SACRIFICE."—The Workingman Helps the Unemployed: A wayfarer in search of work is aided by strange quarryman. ONE HALF MILLION DOLLARS is what HALLBERG saved M. P. men last year

LAST week I told you how the "HALLBERG" Economizer saved Keith's Nickel Theatre, Montreal, over $3066 since it was put in.—Archie L. Shepard put in a HALLBERG in April, 1908, and on August 1 of this year it had saved over $3600 on his electric bill for m. p. lamp.—A. F. Scharnweber, proprietor Crystal Theatre, Ottumwa, Ia., put in a HALLBERG in May, 1908, and on August 1, 1910, it had saved him $960.—A thousand other users of the HALLBERG report similar savings.

Come, let us get together. I can save you money, and give you a 50 per cent. better light in the bargain. If you already have a current saver, I will make a liberal allowance for it in trade for a "HALLBERG" Economizer.

Besides the wonderful "HALLBERG" Economizer, I make 4000 Candle Power Flaming Arc Lamps, and Economizers for incandescent lighting, and sell all high grade moving picture machines which I will gladly demonstrate; opera chairs, lenses and all kinds of supplies. Send $1.50 for a set of "HALLBERG" Terminal Connectors. They stop burning out of lamp leads, and my "Spec-Oil" at 35c. a can by mail, postpaid, saves 25 per cent. on the wear of your machine and over one-half on oil bill.

about to commence. His comrade rushes forward and saves him, but is fatally injured, and as he dies he joins the hands of his comrade and the girl. A fine dramatic story based on the heroism and self-sacrifice which is so frequently displayed by humble folk.

"THE TRAMPS."—If I See Another Woman Kiss You I Will Throw Vitriol at You: The landlady of an inn sees her husband flirting with a girl, and threatens to throw some vitriol over him, if he does not discontinue. She forthwith obtains a wine bottle full of the poison. Two good Customers: The vitroil by accident is given to some tramps. The mistake is discovered, the innkeeper and his wife are arrested, and the tramps are followed. Consternation reigns supreme in the lives of the poor tavern owners. We Have Poisoned the Men: They fully believe they have been guilty of criminal carelessness and are enjoying real contrition. Give Us the Same as Before, Please: The tramps are found unconscious, and when revived are offered the best wines in the inn as a recompense. This does not satisfy them, however, and they ask for more of the liquor supplied them before. To pacify them their request is granted, but the onlookers are amazed to find that no ill effects follow, beyond a further advance in intoxication.

KALEM CO.

"A LEAP FOR LIFE."—This is the title of Kalem Indian picture announced for Sept. 16th and is another of the French-Canadian in which the Kalem players have been so successful of late. The story is vouched for as a real incident gleaned from the early history of Canada during the period when the French voyageurs were in constant contact with the redmen along the border. As the story goes a trapper, one of the group working for the Hudson Bay Company while on night watch in camp accidentally kills a friendly Indian, mistaking him in the dim light for a bear. The trapper is entirely innocent towards animus to the Indians, but this does not help matters and the relatives of the dead Indian determine to take revenge into their own hands. They bide their time and one day when the trapper is alone they round him up and his only avenue of escape is a leap for life from a cliff in the rocks. He makes the leap but without success, although he clutches the shrubbery on the opposite side as he falls to the depths below. The Indians suppose he is dead and that their vengeance is satisfied, but his inanimate body is discovered by an Indian girl, who nurses him back to life. This Indian girl is of the same tribe as the Indian who had been killed by the trapper and she succeeds in establishing peace and in return the trapper takes her to the Jesuit priest and makes her his legal wife.

The story is a pretty one and is well worked out by the Kalem players. The scenes in the Northwest are admirably portrayed both in selection in background and the work of the camera artist.

"THE LITTLE MOTHER."—In "The Little Mother" the Kalem players present a story of New York tenement life contrasted with that of the farm.

As the story goes a prominent Connecticut farmer out of the goodness of his heart offers to take some tenement children from the Fresh Air people on a two weeks' vacation. His invitation is extended to a young shop girl who is earning her own living and that of a little brother and sister, and the tenement house section in which the life of the little mother is portrayed is as characteristic of the proper phase of New York life as has ever been shown, and from the little back tenement the characters are taken to the open country and on the farm they are received as honored guests rather than as objects of charity. The little mother's personality is so winsome that the farmer's son promptly falls in love with her and the romance seems to be proceeding smoothly when a girl from the neighborhood deceives the little mother with a false report, and she goes back to her tenement heart broken and disappointed. The farmer boy, however, learns of the deceit and promptly goes to New York and rescues the little mother from her tenement and takes her and the children back to the farm to stay for good.

The sentiment running through this film is most beautiful and the Kalem players have done it full justice.

"THE GREEN HORN AND THE GIRL."—Another of those western comedies that really are funny. The Greenhorn is having a delightful time learning how to be a cowboy. The more expert range riders are having most of the fun, but the Greenhorn takes it all in good part. The "Old Man" gets a letter announcing the arrival of his niece and he tells the boys. In the same envelope is a portrait of his sister, and this, being dropped, gives the boys the idea that the old lady is coming. With great enthusiasm the Greenhorn is elected to drive to town and bring the Girl back, and he is surprised, as anyone would be, when a vision of loveliness appears on the platform. But the Greenhorn is green only in spots. He persuades the girl that the alkali dust without a veil will ruin her complexion and that is how he manages to keep her to himself on the long rides they take. The others are most willing that the Greenhorn should be her attendant though they cannot quite understand his cheerful devotion. Just to make things interesting they play at Indian and make a savage attack with blank cartridges. The Greenhorn cannot shoot straight and there is small danger of being hit, so they enjoy his brave defense tremendously, rushing in to tell him all about the joke. But the joke is on them. For the first time they see the Girl's face and it's too late. The Greenhorn's bravery has won her.

"MRS. RIVINGTON'S PRIDE."—Banker Rivington married late in life and in spite of his love and her apparent devotion Rivington is not quite certain of his wife. He showers her with presents and just before a reception he gives her a handsome necklace of pearls. Rivington does not like his brother-in-law, a reckless young fellow in whom there is no inherent harm, and when the boy appeals to his sister for a heavy loan to get him out of a financial scrape she loans him the locket to pawn. Rivington finds a part of the letter of appeal which, when read by itself, suggests other than the relationship of blood, and in a fit of anger reproaches his wife. She leaves her home with their little child and for a time supports herself as seamstress. It was an unfortunate move, for Rivington regards it as a confession of error, and though his heart calls to him to bring her back his pride will not permit. Then there comes a lucky turn in the stock market, the pledged jewels are redeemed and sent to the house, the brother knowing nothing of the mischief he has made. Rivington receives the package, perceives his error and goes in search of the woman he has wronged. She is not inclined at first to condone his error, but at last she relents and is clasped in the strong arms. After all it has been a good lesson, for distrust has been banished. On the same reel with "Resourceful Robert."

"RESOURCEFUL ROBERT."—Robert loves a lady and the lady loves him, but what her father thinks of Robert would better be left unsaid, though it is apparent that the old gentleman is not of the same opinion, for he tells Robert very plainly that he will see him in some remote clime before he consents to take him as a son-in-law. Such a frank expression of opinion might discourage some people, but it never phases Robert. He wants to marry the girl and no one else is going to be the same to him, and with such a resourceful person wanting is the same as having. The gardener washing the lawn down gives him an idea. He gets the gardener to wet them down with the hose, an impromptu shower bath that drenches both Robert and the Girl from head to foot. Then an overturned rowboat and the girl's hat, floating with grim significance on the surface of the water, supply the rest of the little drama. The gardener, mindful of the promised tip, rushes for the father and the latter tears his hair as he thinks of his loved little girl lying cold and still at the bottom of the lake. He is in a mood to be repentant, and when Robert comes staggering through the brush bearing the limp form in his arms the old man experiences a revulsion of feeling and everybody lives happily ever after—even the well-tipped gardener.

"IN THE MISSION SHADOWS."—John Stuart, a young business man of the East, comes to San Antonio to locate for the good of his health. While walking about the city he sees an old Padre, or priest, fall from sunstroke. Young Stuart runs to his assistance. At the same time Marion, a young heiress, is passing in her automobile and stops to lend aid to the stricken man. They lift him into the auto and young Stuart is invited to ride with them to the Mission, where the priest lives.

Thus an acquaintance is formed which ripens into an engagement between Marion and John Stuart. Marion's aunt strenuously objects to this alliance, but through the interposition and kindly offices of the old Padre, who has become a close friend of the young couple, they are soon married.

A child is born to them, but does not live a great while. The husband is very much depressed by the loss of his little one, leaves his sorrowing wife and goes out in the hills to shoot game and divert his mind. The wife does not enjoy being left alone and feels neglected; she determines to follow her husband.

While making his way through the woods, the young husband meets a bewitching Spanish girl, who is attracted by him, and, to secure his attention, pretends to sprain her ankle. He assists her, and, as she is unable to walk, he lifts her in his arms and carries her across the stream. His wife appears, immediately concludes that he is unfaithful, and refuses to have anything more to do with him. Their home is broken up and the young couple separate.

Again the old Padre is appealed to by the young man, and, although he is sick and dying, the old man tries to bring them together by writing a letter to the wife informing her that her husband cannot live without her and hopes she will return to him. Marion receives the letter, is greatly distressed and goes to her child's grave in the garden of the Mission and comes across the newly made grave of the old Padre, who has died and been buried near the grave of the child. She thinks it is her husband's and kneels weeping over the little mounds of earth. The young husband visits the graves of his child and his old friend and there sees his wife, when he lovingly approaches and tenderly touches on the shoulder. She looks up at him as if he were an apparition. He holds out his arms and she draws closer and closer to him until folded in his arms they are happily reunited in wedlock's fond embrace under the shadows of the old Mission.

PATHE FRERES.

"A GOOD GLUE."—Mr. Nocash, down on his luck and his rent in arrears, makes a thick concoction in a saucepan. The advent of the bailiff interrupts him and he places the saucepan on a chest. A little of the mess adheres to the piece of furniture and when the bailiff, in making his inventory, comes to move it, he finds himself stuck fast. His assistant has a similar experience, and it dawns upon Nocash that he has made a big discovery. He takes the glue into the street, sets up business on the sidewalk, and does a brisk trade in the sale of his production. The efficacy of its adhesive qualities is fully tested by various purchasers, one of whom glues his future mother-in-law to her chair, in order to run off with the daughter; a second lures a passerby to climb a sticky lamp-post; whilst he calmly rifles his victim's pockets, and a third glues a policeman to the ground. Ultimately all the victims congregate upon the scene, firmly attached to various cumbrous articles. Firemen come to their aid with powerful jets of water, and the fury of the little crowd breaking loose, Nocash is punished and glued with a dab of his own preparation above the door of his domicile.

"HUNTING THE PANTHER."—A remarkable colored scenic film taken in India showing how this beautiful yet dangerous animal is captured.

"THE TWO SISTERS."—Marion and Ella were left orphans at an early age, and were looked after by their aunt, Mrs. Manning. At the time this story opens they were respectively nine and seven years of age, and their young lives were far from happy, for their aunt made them do all the housework and gave them plenty of cuffs and rebukes in return. One day Mr. and Mrs. Simm, being anxious to adopt a young girl, called and the two sisters were placed upon their best behavior and made to look pleasant. Marion was the one selected, and she is taken by the Simms and installed in their luxurious home as their daughter, while Ella is left, despite Marion's tears and entreaties, to continue drudging with her aunt. Ten years elapse and both girls have grown into beautiful young ladies. Ella is still so badly treated by Mrs. Manning that one day, when the latter has gone out, she leaves a note stating that she has decided to earn her own living rather than stand any more bad treatment. She has seen an advertisement in the paper for a maid, and applies for the situation and is accepted. It happens to be that it is at the Simm's home that she gets the job, but the sisters do not recognize one another. Marion's fiance is attracted by Ella's good looks and flirts with her to such a noticeable extent that Marion goes out into the kitchen and rebukes Ella and sends her about her business. This makes her thoroughly disgusted with life and she retires to her room, shuts the door and windows and turns on the gas. Meantime Mrs. Manning has returned and found Ella's note. She also comes across the advertisement which Ella had marked with her pencil. So putting on her bonnet she goes to the address in the ad. She immediately recognizes Mrs. Simm and Marion, and informs the latter that Ella is her sister. Marion repents that she has been so sore at her and rushes to find her. She is found reclining on her bed unconscious. The windows are opened and air admitted and a doctor sent for. He soon brings her to, and happy days now commence to fall to Ella's lot. The young doctor is smitten by her beauty, and a double wedding makes a fitting climax to the picture.

The story is a narrative of heart beats, showing the truth of the old adage that "all's well that ends well."

"UNCONSCIOUS HEROISM."—It is the third month of the siege of Paris by the Germans, and provisions are already very scarce. Gappard, a soldier of the ranks, leaves the ramparts and goes to his home for the dinner his wife has ready for him. His little infant son is crying for milk of which there is none left, but hardened by the horrors and privations of the siege, Gappard is almost callously indifferent to the baby's cries. His elder son is, however, greatly distressed at the infant's cries, and accompanying his father back to duty, slips out of one of the gates unperceived, determined, if possible, to obtain the precious milk. The German sharpshooters seem to be everywhere, but by crawling on his hands and knees, and taking advantage of every bush and tree he manages to progress safely. Once he has a very narrow escape from discovery by a German picket whom he only just manages to elude by covering himself with some bundles of brushwood that were at hand. At last he reaches a farm house, and opening the yard door finds himself in the custody of a German sentry, the farm having been converted into German divisional headquarters. He is led before the German general, who had but a few minutes previous received a letter from his wife and his little son Fritz. The grizzled warrior, with the memory of his own boy still fresh in his mind, is touched by the lad's earnestness and simplicity and believes his story. Admiring his heroism he orders a meal to be provided for him, and after a bottle of milk has been given to him, orders that an orderly see him safely through the German lines. Leaving his guide, the lad makes his way

"THE VAGARIES OF LOVE."—Jack Taring is staying down in the country and is madly in love with Mabel Cory. Although no vows are exchanged it is easy to see that she is just as much fascinated by him and the parting is a very sad one when Jack receives a telegram from his father that they sail the following day. Two years elapse and fickle Mabel, who soon forgot Jack, is now settled down and married to Charles Goring. Jack returns and is riding through the country lanes on his horse when the animal stumbles as Mabel comes unexpectedly through a gap in the hedge, and throws him heavily to the ground at her feet with a dislocated arm. She and her husband help him to the house and send for the doctor. Meantime she has recognized her former admirer, and has great difficulty in restraining her tears. The doctor quickly sets the broken arm, and Jack prepares to leave. Mabel, however, follows him through the park and soon catching up with him they begin to talk over old times. Charles, who has followed, thinks that his wife is flirting with a stranger and is upset. His first idea is to shoot himself, but finally he decides to appeal to an aunt of his who lives close at hand. Jumping into his automobile he drives over and the sharp-witted woman soon devises a plan for testing Mabel's affections. She introduces him to a pretty girl who is staying with her, and they all three motor back to his home, where they find Mabel and Jack in a close conversation on a garden seat. Her husband, however, pays little attention and in accordance with the plan they have concocted pretends to be busily engrossed with his aunt's pretty friend. This soon disturbs Mabel, and getting sore with Jack she follows the couple only to have her suspicions confirmed that they are flirting. She returns and sobbing tells her aunt that her husband is no longer true to her and enters the house. The aunt calls the others and they all follow. She, however, overhears them and determining to give her husband a good fright. seizes a pistol and fires it off in the air, at the same moment falling into a chair and pretending to be shot. Rushing in all are cowed at the turn matters have taken and commence to administer restoratives, but she soon jumps up and begins to upbraid her husband and the girl. They soon explain that the joke is on her and she and her husband fall into one another's arms declaring that they will not be so jealous of one another in the future.

cheer and soothe the childish heart, as all through his young life and to manhood she had been his hope.

Now that Dick Benton had grown to that age when he longed for his own home, he sought his schoolmate sweetheart and we soon find them married and in a little cottage of their own. Dick's business frequently called him from the city, and many times the young wife grew lonesome and unhappy.

Frank Worthing, her former admirer, took advantage of these times to press his attention. One evening the out-going train was reported late; this caused Dick to return suddenly home to spend the wait with his wife, when the butler delivers a message intended for the wife, but read by the husband, who conceals himself and awaits the serpent's sting. Mary, in ignorance of the late train, and overjoyed at Frank's coming, meets him with fond greeting. The husband appears upon the scene, but the prayers his old mother taught him still rang in his ears, he renounced his claim, and with a heavy heart leaves them in their clandestine meeting to their fate.

Dick suffering the pangs of bitter disappointment wanders from his home, but nothing seemed to quiet the raging mind. A kindly friend saves him from further disgrace and brings him home to his dear old mother, whose love and caresses bring happiness to his troubled mind, completing a heart story of unusual merit.

"THE SCHOOLMASTER OF MARIPOSA."—Old man Whey brings his two sons, Hank and Buck to the schoolmaster's cabin to arrange for their schooling. On leaving accompanied by the Master, a riderless horse comes dashing down the road. A hurried run around the bend they are surprised to find Miss Williams lying unconscious by the road side. The Master carries her to the village hotel and provides for her attention with the innkeeper.

The next day, the teacher being solicitous of her condition, calls and finds her much better, leaving some flowers and an invitation to visit the school. She does so in company with Stanchia her suitor. An admiration of more than passing notice is clearly apparent to the suitor to be mutual between the Master and Miss Williams.

Hank and Buck are bent on deviltry instead of books and are seen on the school roof pouring sulphur in the chimney and finally covering it up with a sack. The fumes were stifling and soon drive the occupants to the open. They being discovered by the schoolmaster are soundly trounced by him. Upon their return home, Daddy Whey decides, with the encouragement of Stanchia, that the master must be brought to an accounting. The jealous suitor urges this on and accordingly, the father proceeds to the Master, who is left in a precarious condition, and Whey is arrested.

Three years later things have made many changes and now the once Miss Williams is the wife of the schoolmaster of Mariposa, and he has attained a great history as an artist and flourishing in the results thereof, making a picture of unusual merit based upon actual incident occurring in the county of Mariposa, California.

"THE SEPOY'S WIFE."—Unusual? Very! A drama written on facts during the Sepoy war, 1859. A Sepoy, even more taciturn and moody than is naturally characteristic, hates the English rule and despises the Englishmen, whom he considers intruders and usurpers, not to mention a particular dislike for the surgeon. His spirit is rebellious, and he is ever ready to inflame his fellows against the foreigners, although he is a member of the Imperial Regiment of the English government.

His child is taken seriously ill, and his wife decides to go to the English surgeon and entreat his services in behalf of her little daughter. She finds the doctor fatigued and almost prostrated with exposure from the intense heat of the tropical climate. At first he refuses to leave his home and offers to give her a prescription to the garrison druggist. She supplicates him to go to the child, and through his wife's pleading and reference to his own child he goes with the woman, administers to the little one and restores her to health.

The Sepoy's wife is extremely grateful, while the husband becomes more bitter and antagonistic. He meets his comrades, throws off his uniform and arouses them to rebellion, assumes the leadership and starts to go out to pillage and destroy the Englishmen's homes. The wife overhears their treachery and runs at once to the doctor's home to tell his wife and child of their impending danger, then she leads them to a place of safety.

The rebels burn the doctor's home, and when he arrives there and sees the ruins he concludes that his wife and child have perished in the flames. While gazing upon the smoking pile the Sepoy's wife comes to him, telling him that his family is safe and she will conduct him to them. The insurgents attack the English garrison with a ferocity that means extermination to all hands within the fortification. The exchange of shot is fast and furious, but the besieged hold off the enemy until a company of highlanders, with pipes and kilts, notified by the Sepoy's wife, come to their relief, completely routing the Sepoys and putting an end to the rebellion.

The doctor and his wife, who escaped to the garrison under the guidance of the Sepoy's wife, now join the cheering soldiers as they welcome the highlanders within the garrison. The Sepoy woman, who brought the relieving forces into the stockade, enters with them. The doctor and his wife seize her hand to thank her for the aid she has given them. She looks surprised and says: "You saved my child. I have saved you and your child. I am glad."

"TWO WAIFS AND A STRAY."—The puzzling problem of caring for his two motherless children and getting in his ten hours of labor each day without neglecting either his responsibility as a father and his duties as a bread winner the poor man is absorbed with a mental conflict which might well tax a stronger and better equipped mind. In this subconscious state he leaves his little ones to get through the day as best they can, and while on his way to work is struck by an automobile. His injuries are not apparent, and he refuses assistance; but the accident produces a concussion of the brain, aberration, and he loses consciousness of all preceding events. In this blank state of mind as to his individual identity he wanders from place to place until he reaches a farmhouse in the country, where he asks for food, secures employment and finds a home.

His children have been waiting for their father's return until, exhausted and hungry, they appeal to a kind neighbor, who helps them from her scanty means, giving them a dollar to buy food until they hear from their father, or are taken care of by the children's society, an officer of which has called to look into their case.

The boy, Dick, a bright youngster, decides to go into business with the dollar and take care of his sister, rather than be separated from her in the care of the society. They start out to make their way in life, after establishing themselves in the back yard of a piano factory, transforming an unused packing box into a shelter. Grace purchases a stock of newspapers and disposes of them to the passengers and passers-by at the railroad station, while Dick starts as a bootblack. They manage to keep themselves in food and under cover in their improvised apartment.

The good farmer and his wife, where the father of the two waifs is living, have a little girl whom the mother takes to town on a shopping tour. While in the city she loses the child and returns home heart-broken. The child wanders about, is picked up by the two waifs, who take her to their retreat and care for her.

The Children's Aid Society announce their excursions and vacations for poor children. The farmer and his wife read about them, decide to visit the society's country home in search of their little one. They go and find their daughter, who tells them how she was cared for by Grace and Dick, and by them brought to the excursion. The man and his wife meet the little protectors of their child and invite them to their home for a vacation. They accept, and when they reach the farmhouse they meet their father, whose mind is restored at sight of his children. They are given a home with the good people under the same roof and direct care of their father, who has made himself a valuable and faithful employee.

"A LUNATIC AT LARGE."—A college professor, named Tuttle, instructor of zoology and "bugology," becomes insane and is committed to an asylum for the insane.

A Mr. Ward, living near the asylum, receives word from a friend that an eminent scientist, Professor Burling, specialist in entomology, will visit America and will call on him.

Professor Tuttle escapes from the asylum and wanders off into the woods in search of rare specimens of insect life. Professor Burling, passing through the same wood on his way to visit Mr. Ward, sits down to rest and incidentally finds some interesting species of life. He carefully examines them with his magnifying glass, which he puts back into his satchel, then falls asleep. The escaped lunatic comes along, finds the eminent scientist enjoying his nap, takes his satchel and goes in further search of the animalculae kingdom.

He saunters along until he comes to the home of Mr. Ward, enters and proceeds to make himself at home by removing his shoes and coat, seating himself at the table and examining things with the magnifying glass. The maid comes in. He hops around like a frog, examines her hair and plucks the bow from her cap, which he investigates very carefully, thinking it some rare species of butterfly. The girl runs from the room and summons her employer. Mr. Ward looks at the foolish professor, who jumps onto the table and does other surprising capers which set his host guessing until he sees the satchel with the name "John Burling" on it. He tries to make his guest at ease, and while he is talking the lunatic jerks the buttons from Mr. Ward's vest as if they were beetles or some other living thing that might escape him. Humoring his eccentric friend, Mr. Ward induces him to retire.

While all this is going on the guards at the asylum discover the escape of Professor Tuttle and start out to find him. They call at Mr. Ward's, who informs them he has no tidings of Professor Tuttle. They hasten away. They have no sooner gone when the real Professor Burling comes to visit Mr. Ward, who mistakes him for the escaped lunatic, ties him to a chair and calls up the asylum to come get him at once. They get there in a buggy, but fail to recognize the captive as the lunatic, whom they describe and whom Mr. Ward identifies is the man he is entertaining. They release Burling, rush into the bedroom and find the "bird" has flown through the window.

They all start in pursuit; the chase is exciting, and the daffy professor proves himself to be a regular "cut-up," jumping up into trees and doing some extraordinary stunts from the lamp-post and anything else that gets in his way, until he is captured in a lake, into which he makes an Annette Kellerman dive.

Professor John Burling is disgusted with his experience and the whole blooming business, and decides to get away from it all. Mr. Ward seems to be in wrong with his distinguished guest, but after much explanation and reconsideration of the matter they look at the whole affair as a huge joke, and have a jolly good laugh over a social glass and a friendly cigar.

"THE GREAT SECRET."—Miss Baura Guth, a clever American woman, is engaged by a firm of New York corset makers, through their representative, Mr. Frederick Schmaltz, to go to Paris, and make designs of the forthcoming fashions in Parisian corsets. Miss Guth is admonished to keep her movements as secret as possible so that the rival concerns in America will not know of her actions. Miss Guth proceeds with her work. One day she seeks the quiet of a French fortification to do some sketching. She happens to think of some lines in the latest design she is drawing and standing at the base of one of the big cannons, she proceeds to insert some additions to her sketch. Finishing this, she places it in her suit case. In traveling, Miss Guth carries a kodak, and seeing a pretty scene before her, she takes a snap shot. This action is witnessed by a sentry, who, instead of arresting the lady on the

MRS. RIVINGTON'S PRIDE

Rivington married late in life and was none too sure of his power to hold his wife's affections. His fears are groundless, but they are very real to him, and when Mrs. Rivington's graceless brother obtains the loan of a necklace that he might pledge it and so save himself from financial ruin, her pride causes her to refuse to tell what disposition she has made of the jewels. Rivington puts the worst construction upon her silence, but all's well that ends well, and love is the stronger for having been tried.

RESOURCEFUL ROBERT

Robert is a resourceful person, and it does not bother him in the least when the father of the girl he loves makes it painfully plain that Robert is not eligible as a son-in-law. That is all the old man knows about it, for not for nothing is Robert resourceful. There is the nearby river and a gardener wetting down the lawn. A boat is overturned, Grace's hat is left to float close by, and after soaking Robert and the girl the gardener draws attention to the boat. That's Robert's cue to reappear and receive paternal blessings.

Zeb and Zeke were friends until the widow came, but the two old codgers cannot stand being rivals in love, and it is war to the death between them. Zeke has the inside track with his buggy, but Zeb buys an auto and enjoys a moment of pride until the auto runs away with the widow and Zeke. Zeke steers it into a ravine and Zeb threatens to have the law on him. Things look bad when the widow leaves for the city with an apologetic note, and in the mutual condolences the old friendship is renewed. Plenty of good fun of action as well as idea.

spot for having a camera within the fortifications, runs to his superior officer and reports the incident. This functionary feels that he should report the matter to the commandant, which he proceeds to do. After receiving his order from the commandant the officer returns with the sentry to find that Miss Guth has taken her departure. This simple incident is worked up into a tremendous affair because of the fact that the German Government is supposed to have had agents endeavoring to get photographs and plans of the French fortifications. The matter is finally brought to the attention of the Minister of War and he calls to his office the Captains Three, Captain Dunois, Villalon and Lepard, three clever, adventurous military Frenchmen. He shows them a letter from the secret service department, which in substance relates that Miss Laura Guth, the American woman who is suspected of having photographs and plans of the fortifications at Rheims and of being an emissary of the German Government, has evaded the vigilance of the secret service men and no doubt gone to London en route for New York. The Minister of War despatches the three men to get Miss Guth and also the plans which she has in her possession.

The story now follows the Captains Three. We see them board the American liner in mid-stream, and we watch their actions on shipboard throughout the voyage to New York. We know what the Captains Three do not, that they are on a false scent. They are most serious in their pursuit of Miss Guth, who, by the way, has booked her passage under a fictitious name, in order to preserve the secrecy necessary in her business. Captain Lepard has met Miss Guth, little knowing that she is the person he is seeking, and has become enamored of her. He discovers who she is by her accidentally leaving with him a magazine in which her visiting card is marking the page. When Lepard discovers that the girl to whom he has been paying serious attention is the woman his Government is seeking to implicate in a commission of national crime, his inward struggle is most dramatic. He is torn between love and duty. Finally duty wins and he confides to his fellow officers what he has discovered.

From now on the three men watch Miss Guth closely. We see Lepard, who has heretofore been the soul of chivalry and attention, avoiding the lady as much as possible. Miss Guth does not understand the gallant Frenchman's conduct, and there is a frigidity which is only intelligible to the audience. The three Frenchmen watch Miss Guth through the porthole of their stateroom, see her taking plans from her suit case and reading a letter. After she leaves the room they enter it and finding the plans locked in the suit case are somewhat taken aback. They read the letter, however, from Frederick Schmaltz and they are convinced that they are on the track of a great conspiracy.

Arriving in New York they follow Miss Guth, never taking their eyes from the suit case in her hand. As she passes through the Custom House they are on the continuous watch. They follow her through the streets of New York in a taxicab, arriving shortly after she does at her Fifth Avenue apartment. Entering the parlor shortly after she has come to the house, the big dramatic and comedy scene of the picture is enacted. The Frenchmen are filled with various emotions. Civility to a lady, duty to France and a feeling that they are in the presence of a great national criminal. Captain Lepard is torn with varied feelings. We see the young French officer evidently deeply in love with the girl he is about to take before the Consul of his country. The whole situation is turned to a tremendous laugh when Miss Guth finally discovers what they are interested in, namely the plans which she has in her bag. These she shows to the gentlemen to their intense chagrin and disappointment. Captain Lepard is simply flabbergasted. Miss Guth had felt in love with him until she became aware of his peculiar uncertain attitude. She now feels that Lepard merely made love to her thinking that she was a German spy and for the purpose of capturing her. She tells him so. The impulsive Frenchman throws himself upon his knees and tells her it was nothing of the sort, that in his heart he had a deep and passionate regard for her. He begs to accept him as her suitor, which she finally does. There is a clever comedy ending to the scene which must be witnessed to be appreciated.

A high class comedy in every way, acted throughout with sincerity and working up to a climax that is irresistible.

"FROM THE ARCTICS TO THE TROPICS."—The Central Railroad of Peru, the most remarkable railway in the world, starts at sea level, at Callao and runs to the highest point reached by any railway in the world. This is somewhat higher than the summit of Mount Blanc, or to be exact, sixteen thousand feet above sea level. In the trip which we are privileged to take upon this railway, we start at the high point and getting into a gravity car we begin a coast of one hundred miles down the Andes, literally from the Arctics to the Tropics. Upon starting, the country is covered with snow and ice and our passengers are well muffled up. As we go further and further in our somewhat wild ride through many tunnels, gorges and scenes of the utmost beauty, it becomes gradually warmer and warmer until we are almost shocked to find that it is really warm, and necessity exists for taking off first the heavier clothing and then our hats and coats. Finally just before reaching our destination at Callao we pass through a real tropical village, thus experiencing probably the quickest change from winter to summer that is possible in the whole world.

From the above it will be seen that this film is of a most unusual character. It was taken for us by our special operator in South America and will prove to be of general as well as educational interest.

"BUMPTIOUS AS A FIREMAN."—The enthusiastic reception accorded to Mr. Bumptious and his exploits has resulted in the present story, being added to the list as a worthy successor to its forerunners. It introduces not only Bumptious and his immediate family, but all of the familiar types that have become popular along with him, the gum chewing girl, who is really the heroine of this story; the aviators, who forgive his wrecking of their balloon, and even the man whose sad experiences in helping him to paper the parlor would naturally be long remembered. But a new phase in Bumptious' character makes all these people his admirers and friends for the time being at least. Bumptious appears as a man of action, of valor, of courage and of rewarded virtue.

We see early in the film a small sized conflagration caused by the cook's burning the beefsteak, and Bumptious appearing does what any sensible man would do, throws it incontinently out the kitchen window. But the smoke has attracted his friends and neighbors and his wife and cook have explained the danger to them; consequently when Mr. Bumptious appears upon the front porch and announces that the fire is out, he is promptly hailed as a hero. The result of the incident is the organization of an amateur or volunteer fire department and Mr. Bumptious is offered the captaincy and presented with a helmet and a bugle, which adorn his unctious personality most comically. And then not long after we see the volunteer fire department called into active service. Of course all of the other members are awakened by the fire bell save Bumptious, their captain, and passing his house they call upon him loudly to come and lead them in fighting the fire demon. He commands them to lead on and he will follow, which he does as fast as his little fat legs will carry him, but they reach the fire house, get out the hose and start for the fire before he gets there. The result is that several scenes show the fire hose dashing up the street and Bumptious in hot pursuit. When they reach the fire their struggles to get the hose and water into action are something terrible to behold. Bumptious becomes a regular Laocoon entangled in the hose. And then he suddenly sees a face at the window from which the smoke is issuing in the boarding house which is apparently in flames. Like the hero that he is, he releases himself from the detaining hands of his friends and dashes into the house to the rescue of the maiden. We see him hammering at the hall door but without response, and then shifting to the inside we see the girl whom he is to rescue. When one understands that it is the gum chewing girl who is reading a novel by a smoky lamp, quite ignorant of any danger, the comic side of the situation will be evident. The door is burst in, Bumptious breaking it through with a hall chair, and he dashes in upon the scene only to be confronted by his particular aversion, the gum chewing girl. His friends follow to succor and aid him in rescuing her and as soon as they are well into the room the only remaining member of the fire department climbs up the outside of the porch by a ladder and some one thereupon turns on the water in the hose which he carries. The result is that instead of a conflagration there is a deluge, for the company is soaked with the unmanageable stream from the hose in the hands of one of their members, and everything in the room reduced to desolation, which is comparable only with Bumptious' own state of mind.

The fun in this film is more fast and furious than in any of the others, but nothing of Bumptious' personality is sacrificed thereby. It ought to prove a jolly addition to the season's fun, adding not a little to the gaiety of the nations of the earth.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"IN LIFE'S CYCLE."—The mother is the real guardian angel of the child. Her guiding hand and tender care mould our character and make us, if we adhere to their precepts, the upright men and women we should be. Consequently what a disastrous thing is the loss of a mother by young children. There is the father you would say—yes, but he does not understand the shaping of their little minds, building their natures, though he would lay down his own life for their good. This is the sad condition of the two children in this Biograph story. James Mullen, living in retirement at his country villa since the death of his wife, finds consolation in the love of his two children, Clara and Vincent, aged ten and twelve years respectively. It has been their custom to visit their mother's grave and place a wreath of flowers upon it. Seven years later, the children now grown, Vincent leaves for the seminary to study for the priesthood, while Clara undertakes to console their father, promising not to forget their mother's grave. Vincent, now a seminarian, writes to his sister of how happy he is in the call of the church. Clara, while returning from the postoffice whither she had gone in quest of a letter from Vincent, meets a handsome young man from the city. This stranger immediately lays siege to her heart, which feeling is more than reciprocated by Clara. She yields to the temptation to meet him clandestinely and during these meetings the stranger tries to persuade her to elope with him. At last she consents, and leaving a letter for her father, she runs off to the city with the tempter. Vincent has a premonition of something wrong and hastens to his father's side where he learns the truth. He breathes a prayer for her deliverance, but she is made to suffer for her false step. She goes through a purgatory ten years with this man who not only denies her the right to the name of wife, but subjects her and their child to abject poverty, he drinking up what little she earns. In a drunken brawl at the saloon he falls against the rail of the bar, injuring himself fatally, but before he dies, he, in a measure, makes reparation by marrying Clara. During all this time Vincent has attended to the mother's grave, begging her interception before God in his sister's behalf, the whereabouts of whom he is ignorant. After the death of her profligate consort Clara takes her little one and starts off to make a last visit to her mother's grave. Here she falls prostrate, praying for help and forgiveness. In this position she is found by Vincent who arrives on his regular pilgrimage. At last his prayers have been answered for later, Vincent, Clara and her little one are folded to the old father's breast.

"A MOHAWK'S WAY."—Indefatigable in the extreme was the Mohawk; excessive in his expression of gratitude, he is equally determined in his quest for vengeance—just, however, being his incentive. Highly emotional, he possesses the power of dissembling to such an extent, as to ascribe him stoical. This double nature is clearly shown in this Biograph story, which gives it a Cooper atmosphere. Dr. Van Brum, the white medicine-man, is a being totally devoid of fellow-feeling, in fact a contemptible despot. The Indian medicine-man has failed to cure the little papoose, over whom the brave and his squaw bend in abject anxiety The medicine-man's incantations proving fruitless the brave decides to seek the white doctor's aid. Van Brum refuses to waste his time on this Indian, and in reply to the poor fellow's earnest entreaties, knocks him down. The doctor's wife, however, hears the Indian's pleading and surreptitiously goes to administer to the fever-stricken papoose. The remedy is in the form of pellets, a bottle of which the good woman leaves with the squaw, with the injunction to give the baby more at regular intervals. The little one convalesces immediately, and the innocent squaw looks upon the bottle as cabalistic. In fact the entire tribe regard it a supernatural charm, and so hold it in awe, the squaw hanging it by a chain around her neck as a fetish. This in a measure, sets to rest the enmity that has existed with the Indians for the doctor. His tyranny has made him an odious neighbor. This condition of peace does not last long, for the doctor offers an insult to the squaw while she with others are cavorting on the river bank. She resorts to the bottle's charm for protection, but at this the doctor laughs, until she draws a dagger. The doctor, a coward, is thwarted. The Indians, upon hearing of the episode, declare war, and start after the doctor, who has fled with his wife on horseback. By a short cut the Indians waylay the fugitive and the doctor after an exhibition of his despicable cowardice meets his just deserts, while the wife is carried to the camp where she is about to suffer the same fate as her husband, when the squaw appears and in gratitude demands her release. This the braves are loath to do until she holds up the mysterious medicine bottle, the sight of which strikes terror and they withdraw. The squaw and brave then escort the woman to the river where she is taken aboard the old ferry and carried across to safety in the British camp on the opposite side.

PICTURE MAN HAD IT ON BRIDAL PARTY.

A motion picture romance had an exciting climax when the bride and groom tried to escape from their friends to a waiting taxicab, only to discover that a zealous picture machine operator had rigged up his spotlight so that it could be turned full in their faces as they came down the steps of the bride's home. Robert Richardson is the ticket taker at a motion picture theatre at Driggs avenue and South Fourth street, and Rebecca Cohen lives opposite, at 779 Driggs avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. They fell in love and were married at the home of the bride's parents.

The young couple had hoped to avoid the usual bombardment of slippers and rice by sneaking away in the dark to their taxicab, but their plans went awry in a sudden and surprising manner. Opposite, in the show house, the operator, in his little iron cell near the ceiling kept watch from a small window overlooking the street. Finally he saw two shadowy figures dash down the Cohen front steps. They were only shadowy for a couple of seconds, however, when all at once they found themselves in the centre of a disc of blinding white light. The operator had turned the theatre's spotlight full on them from across the street. They made the best kind of a target for half a dozen old slippers and enough rice to make puddings for the entire German army.

Jeffries-Johnson Pictures at Banquet.

Quite a fuss was created in police circles here a few days ago by the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures at a banquet given at the Congress Hotel by a prominent corporation to visiting guests. The following account of the affair appeared in the "American" of this city:

"Police Sergeant Charles E. O'Donnell, detailed to make an investigation, reported today that moving pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures were exhibited at a banquet given in the Gold Room of the Congress Hotel by the Dupont Powder Company to the 290 members of the Lake Superior Mining Company, August 26.

"In his report Sergeant O'Donnell confesses that he was unable to get any particular information as to who was responsible.

"Manager Brumsted, who is in charge of the local branch of the powder company, said, according to the police, that he had nothing to do with the banquet and that all arrangements had been made by the home office.

"Detective Frank Repetto of the Congress Hotel said that he did not know anything about the banquet except that at 9.30 o'clock the doors of the banquet hall had been closed and locked —presumably because the diners desired to discuss private business.

"Manager Burke of the Congress Hotel said he did not know anything about the exhibition except what he had read, and that he had not been able to find anyone who had been present at the reported exhibition."

The decision on the Jeffries-Johnson pictures is still reserved and the assurance from certain quarters that it would be rendered last Friday, Sept. 2, as stated in my last letter, has vanished into thin air. Not only this; the Forest Park sentiment regarding the exhibition of the pictures led the village board to pass an ordinance Tuesday night, Sept. 6, which will do away with the exhibition in less than two weeks' time.

The ordinance was passed unanimously by the seven members of the board. It provides against prize fights, sparring exhibitions, or moving pictures of them, and any moving picture exhibition of a suggestive or immoral nature. It will go into effect 10 days after its publication, Thursday, Sept. 8.

In the meantime, the managers of the Hughes and Forest Park theatres are determined to corral all the business possible in the time that is left them.

The trustees left the hall as soon as the ordinance was passed—it took less than 10 minutes to read and pass it—and avoided being quetioned, several of them having previously expressed opinions that the exhibition was neither immoral nor brutal.

Chief of Police Steward caused the arrest of Edward Burke, assistant manager of the Congress Hotel, since the writing of my former article on this subject, on the charge of permitting an exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures at the banquet in that hotel, on August 28. Bonds were provided and the hearing of the case will take place in the Harrison Street court later.

Chief of Police Conally of Waukegan, Ill., has stopped a proposed presentation of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures at a local theatre there, on the ground that the exhibition was improper.

Motiograph Sales Boom.

Additional machinery was installed by the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., of Chicago, about two months ago, in order to meet the increased business of that firm in the sale of the Motiograph moving picture machine.

A. C. Roebuck, president of the company, tells me that they have just placed additional orders for more machinery to the extent of several thousand dollars, and this, together with the investment necessary to carry the increased quantity of goods, has necessitated a large addition to their former large investment The rapidly increasing demand for the Motiograph made the move imperative, as it has always been the motto of this firm to fill orders promptly.

LYDA THEATRE, 48TH AVENUE AND LAKE STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.
George H. Hines, Proprietor and Manager.

New Producing Manager for Essanay.

The Essanay Film Mfg. Co. has secured the services of Harry McRae Webster, a widely known stage manager and actor, to take charge of the producing end of the business at the Essanay plant during the absence in the West of G. M. Anderson, who will depart with his Western company about the middle of the month. Mr. Webster comes direct from Philadelphia, where he is well known in theatrical circles as an able manager and stage director.

A Popular Pathe Employe.

P. M. Perretz, assistant manager of the Pathe Western office, completed his fifth year with that firm on Tuesday, Sept. 6.

Mr. Perretz started in as errand boy under the former manager, Mr. Montagu, when the film business in Chicago amounted to only a few reels per week, and when there was no such thing as a fixed release date, and, therefore, no regular releases. In a short time, however, the Pathe product forged ahead and practically stood alone in the field, so far as competition was concerned.

Mr. Perretz is better known to the trade as "Percy," and many who know him well would be unable to give his surname, if questioned. He is a hard worker and is familiar with all the kinks in his end of the business.

Chicago Film Brevities.

A. G. Rider, formerly manager of Lincoln Park theatre, 1932 Clark street, purchased that theatre August 10 last. Mr. Rider contemplates putting in a new front with three exits, instead of two, as most houses have. He is also installing a new ventilation system, largely designed by himself. About 800 cubic feet of fresh air will be brought in every ten seconds, and the air in the theatre will be changed every 1½ minutes. Manager Rider has the credit of showing the clearest pictures in the city and takes pleasure in stating that the Motiograph picture machine enables him to do it.

"The Gambler's Wife," a full-reel American subject by Pathe Freres, was seen by me in the Pathe private projecting room last week. The subject is one of thrilling interest and is splendidly photographed. The film was released Sept. 7, and is certain to add to the renown of the Pathe people.

Wm. N. Selig was enabled to get a transfer of Geo. H. Hines' No. 1 license from the Senate theatre, on West Madison, to the new Lyda theatre, at 48th avenue and Lake street, through the courtesy of the M. P. P. Co. George is exceedingly proud of this license, as there is not another one in the world beside it, and from what he tells me, the new Lyda theatre will soon have one of the best straight moving picture shows to be seen anywhere in the country. He is running vaudeville and one picture now, but his friends know that he cannot keep away from pictures. His business is keeping up well and the Lyda is getting well known in the neighborhood as the home of enjoyable entertainment.

The General Film Company, at 85 Dearborn street, has been obliged to add a large number of extra prints to their stock lately, in order to meet the growing demand of the largely increased list of customers on the books. For the week beginning Monday, Sept. 5, 30 new customers were enrolled. A large night force, including 6 inspectors, 8 messenger boys, 1 record clerk and 1 superintendent—16 in all—is required to carry on the company's business. Over 70 people are on the office pay roll.

The Travett theatre, 63d street and Cottage Grove avenue, reopened Sept. 5, and is getting its service from the General Film Company. Manager Quinn is running vaudeville and pictures.

The Airdome, Keokuk, Iowa, changed its policy from vaudeville and pictures to straight moving pictures Friday, Sept. 2. Manager Harvey Hull is getting his service from the General Film Company, at 85 Dearborn street Arthur Hull and Harvey Hull are owners of the Airdome. The former was at one time on the clerical force of the Theatre Film Service and at present holds a responsible position with the Yale Exchange of St Louis. Harvey Hull is a well known character singer, having appeared in the best vaudeville houses.

W. R. Scates, assistant manager of the General Film Company here, who was confined to his room by a renewed attack of pleurisy, was able to be in his office Monday, Sept. 5. Mr. Scates has not fully recovered, but the pressure of business is such that he determined to reengage in his work.

Burton Holmes, the well-known travelogue lecturer, arrived from his auto-European trip Saturday, August 27. During his European tour he visited Oberammergau, where he saw the Passion Play. Mr. Holmes has five new lectures in his repertoire for the coming season. These cover continental Europe and Siberia. He will open the season in October, at Orchestra Hall, this city, where he will remain for five weeks.

R. R. Nehls, manager of the K. O. Company's importing department, returned last week from a week's holiday spent in northern Michigan and Wisconsin.

Frank L. Hough, Jr., traveling salesman for the Edison Company, in the territory between Chicago and the Pacific Coast, was in the city last week. Mr. Hough will give demonstrations of the Edison No. 5 machine throughout his territory. He will make the Chicago Edison Western office his headquarters.

F. B. Mytinger, traveling representative of the General Film Company, at 85 Dearborn street, returned last week from a three months' trip through Indiana, Illinois and Iowa. He informed me that business throughout the territory mentioned was especially good with licensed exhibitors.

Mr. Wm. T. Rock, father of John Rock, Western manager of the Vitagraph Company, was in the city last week from Thursday, Sept. 1 until Sunday, Sept. 4, when he returned to New York. Mr. Rock was the guest of his son, at his cottage on Fox Lake, during his stay here. John proved a mighty hunter on this occasion, as he got up at 3 a. m., on the opening day of the hunting season for ducks, and was successful in getting several fine mallards and about a dozen rail birds to tempt his father's appetite. During Mr. Rock's stay he had several fine motoring trips in the Fox Lake country, and his son gave him very little time to rest.

Mr. Wiebold, a prominent dry goods merchant on the Northwest Side, and already interested in a moving picture theatre, has made all preliminary preparations for the construction of a new theatre at Belmont and Lincoln avenues, which will cost $50,000. Mr. Wiebold has announced that the new theatre will be devoted exclusively to the exhibition of licensed pictures, and good music.

John Rock tells me that "Baseball, That's All," Melies' release for Sept. 8, is an especially strong subject and a rattling fine comedy. There has been a big demand for it, as it makes a special appeal to basebull rooters and enthusiasts. Quite a number of extra prints have been ordered for it. Another promising Melies' subject "In the Mission Shadows," will be released Sept. 15. I saw this film run off in the Vitagraph projecting room, and was much impressed by its beautiful scenery and fine photography. The story is laid in San Antonio, Tex, and everyone knows the beauty of the scenery and buildings in that quaint city. The Alamo and old Spanish Mission houses are seen in the pictures, which are unusually clear and beautiful. A strong love story is the subject of the film.

"A MODERN KNIGHT ERRANT"

A Vitagraph Drama

YOU know years ago the knight errants started out in quest of adventure or to engage in tournament at arms with some rival, real or imaginary, for the love of the woman whom they loved whether she loved them or not. They went forth clad in steel armor and helmet, sword and spear.

Not so with the modern knight errant. He goes forth armed with two good hands and a stout heart to make his way and conquer the world and if possible, to write his name in the hall of fame or among the successful business men of this age of progress and advancement. He starts out with a purpose, an object in view and he generally gets there or knows the reason why. Nothing imaginary or chimerical about him when it comes to matters of love or doing things of real consequence.

When Cyril Harley as a modern knight errant went on his college vacation to improve his health, make his living and recoup his finances for the winter term he got a job on a large farm in the wheat fields of Minnesota and took his place among the hands with a determination to hold his own with the rest of them. He did and what's more he won the love of the prettiest and most charming girl in the neighborhood who occasionally, as customary, worked in the fields and she always managed to get near Cyril.

Tom, a big bully, was jealous of Cyril and didn't hesitate to show it. He even went so far as to strike Mary's crippled brother but he didn't count on the modern knight errant when he tried to intimidate Mary. Cyril caught him at it and told him what he though of him. The bully resented his interference and challenged him to fight. The challenge was accepted and after Mary had gone home the battle begins.

When we know the cause of the trouble and the young lady in whose defence and for whose hand and heart Cyril is fighting we are willing to run a mile to see it to a finish and we can hardly sit in our seats and restrain ourselves from shouting out a word of encouragement to the hero as the conflict advances. And when we see the big bully lying prone on the ground we can't resist saying: "Good" and we say it so every one can hear it.

The poor crippled brother runs back to his sister Mary and tells her how it ended. She just claps her hands and hurries to meet her knight errant whom she finds bathing a sprained wrist at the lake. She offers to bind it for him and while she is tying the knot he tells her he wishes it was the marriage knot. She says she's sorry he got hurt for her; he replies that the pleasure is all his, then she throws her arms around his neck kisses him and frightened at the impulsive manifestations of her love, she runs home like a deer leaving Cyril in happy contemplation.

There is an extreme naturalness about this picture that makes it so real we are carried right into it. Mary looks good from the start and she gains our sympathy and interest as the plot ripens until we find ourselves as much in love with her as the hero and we don't blame him for fighting for her. When he defends her unfortunate brother from the bully and gives him a good beating, we know he is a brick and glad of it when we know Mary loves him.

This is the kind of pictures that make real men and women feel life is worth living and make heroes and heroines of us all. Let us have more of them.

ELECTRICAL TALKS.

voltage is 100, the formula in simplified form reads as follows:

100 volts x 20 amperes equals 2,000 watts. In view of the last formula, you can easily remember that for all direct current systems it is only necessary to multiply the line voltage by the amperes flowing through the circuit in order to find the number of Watts required.

In explanation of the above formulas remember the following:

C stands for current in amperes.

E stands for the line voltage or the voltage at the point where test is made.

R stands for resistance, of the rheostat or machine, in ohms.

W stands for Watts.

SUMMARY.

The amperes flowing through a circuit or machine are equal to the voltage, divided by the resistance in ohms.

The resistance in ohms of a circuit or machine is equal to the voltage divided by the amperes flowing.

The voltage at the terminals of a circuit or machine is equal to current in amperes flowing multiplied by the resistance in ohms.

The watts consumed in a circuit, machine, incandescent or arc lamps are equal to the current in amperes times the voltage at the terminals where the test is made excepting for alternating systems having "inductive" resistance.

In our next talk, we will discuss the different kinds of current as made and sold by the electric lighting companies for theatres.

ANOTHER HOUSE FOR HOUSTON.

Captain Tyrrell of Beaumont, Texas, was in Houston, Aug. 19, and made a purchase of another lot adjoining the two lots on which he intended building a vaudeville and motion picture theatre. This gives him seventy-five feet frontage and he will erect a two-story brick, 75 x140 feet. The lower story will be used for business and an up-to-date vaudeville theatre and pool room. Captain Tyrrell owns much valuable property in this city and it is all a paying asset, getting good rentals from his buildings. Last week he purchased the J. F. Winn home as a home for some of his family. Captain Tyrrell has plans for other buildings to go up in the near future, one of which is a large three-story rooming house constructed on up-to-date plans. This is a much needed acquisition and will lead to building others.

Synopsis of Production Issued by the Leading Song and Novelty Slide Makers

DE WITT C. WHEELER.

"HE GOT RIGHT UP ON THE WAGON."—Words by Harry Williams; music by Egbert Van Alstyne; published by Jerome H. Remick. A comic song by these two popular young authors, which bids fair to make a big hit. The slides are it, both in quality and humor. They depict in Wheeler's well known comic way the young man who climbed upon the water wagon because of a promise, and who while sitting there became so dizzy that he fell off with a terrible bump. A fine set.

"ON MOBILE BAY."—Words by Earle C. Jones; music by Chas. N. Daniels; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. A high class Southern love ballad, with illustrations that are "peachy." They are those good old Southern scenes among the darkies and the cotton, etc. Also many beautiful water scenes with models that are A1 on looks and fascinating of manner.

"FIFTY YEARS AGO."—(Dear Old Chums). Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L'Albert; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. The lyrics portray the love of an old couple, which has spanned a period of 50 years. The melody is by the composer of "Hiawatha," who sometimes uses the nom-de-plume of L'Albert. The slides tell the story only too well of this loving old couple so rich in steadfastness. We see them in their old age and we see them as they were in youth, 50 years ago, dressed in the picturesque garb of that period. We see also many very beautiful rural scenes that are assuredly of home interest. Beautifully posed and colored in Wheeler's excellent style.

"LOVE ME AGAIN."—Words and music by Robert M. Stults; published by F. B. Haviland, New York. A love ballad of the higher order, written in masterly style, and fully up to the standard of quality set by the house of Haviland. Illustrations of excellent photographic quality and clever posing, rich in nature study and human interest, are produced by Wheeler.

"BY THE MOSS COVERED WELL, DEAR ESTELLE."—Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L. Albert; published by J. H. Remick & Co. One of the timely love ballads, written in a reminiscent theme. Both lyrics and melody do full justice to the writers. The slides are of the truly Wheeler type that we like to see. They are of the dainty order, which appeal to the sense of beauty; posed in country style near a quaint old well, and are beautifully colored with the tone of nature.

"SUGAR MOON."—Published by J. H. Remick & Co. It is seldom in late years that a coon song becomes popular, but this one is certainly it, and looks like a hit. It is also seldom that we view a set of "darky" slides, so that when the opportunity is presented to do so, as in this set of Mr. Wheeler's, it is a novelty. The illustrations are full of characteristic southern poses of the black race. They are cleverly and amusingly carried out so as to make this set a very interesting one.

"SPOONLIGHT."—Words by Earle Clinton; music by Charlotte Blake; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. This is a true spooning song, and Mr. Clinton has taken full advantage of his subject and produced an exceptionally good set of lyrics. The melody has a clever swing which cannot fail to become popular. The slides do full justice to the song and are posed by good looking models who fall into natural poses. The moonlight effects reflect credit on the Wheeler slides, and the last slide is a girl surrounded with spoons, which produces a novel effect. An exceptionally good set of slides.

"IT'S MOONLIGHT ALL THE TIME ON BROADWAY."—Words by Ren Shields; music by Percy Wenrich; published by F. B. Haviland Publishing Co., New York. It would be useless to criticise either the lyrics or melody of this song, as these writers can always be depended upon to produce the goods, and they certainly have not failed in this instance. Mr. Wheeler has produced a set of slides every one of which is a novelty, and the effects of the Great White Way illuminated by night reproduced in a small lantern slide are truly wonderful. This set is without doubt the best set released by any slide maker, and shows what vast improvements are constantly being added to the productions of this house.

SCOTT & VAN ALTENA.

"GRIZZLY BEAR."—Words by Irving Berlin; music by George Botsford; pubished by Ted Snyder Co., New York. Little need be said about the popularity of this latest hit of Irving Berlin's. It is heard wherever one goes, which fact is pretty conclusive evidence that it is a success. The slides for this set are on the novelty order, just as the song itself. They tell by pictures just how they do that grizzly bear dance out West—that hugging, squeezing dance. The cowboy is there, of course, with his girl, and together they go through many antics that amuse the watcher. A sure 'nough bear figures in this set.

"NIGHT BRINGS THE STARS AND YOU."—Lyric by Arthur J. Lamb; music by S. R. Henry; pubished by Jos. W. Stern & Co., New York. A baritone of alto solo of exceptional merit, for which Scott & Van Altena have produced a set of slides that are remarkable for their beautiful scenery and many novelties. The posing, clever in itself, is enhanced by the beautiful surroundings that are made so wonderful by this firm's expert colorists. The novelties are the own ideas of the heads of the concern, and exhibitors may be assured that they will get their money's worth in this set, so full of these novelties.

"STOP YOUR BLUSHING, ROSIE."—Written and composed by Lewis and Bennett, co-authors of "Daddy Was a Grand Old Man," "Take Your Hands Away," "Under the Blushing Moon," etc., and Monroe H. Rosenfeld, author of "Take Back Your Gold," "With All Her Faults I Love Her Stil," and many famous successes. Published by M. H. Rosenfeld, New York. The song, which deals with Cupid and a pair of youthful lovers, is exceptionally well illustrated with a variety of beautiful pictures, artistically posed and wonderfully colored. The set contains some very new and novel slides which are always to be found in Scott & Van Altena's sets.

"I WANT TO BUY A LITTLE BIT OF LOVE."—By Chas. K. Harris. This is the pathetic story of a little girl who was under the care of a stepmother. She went one day with a few pennies to a candy store to ask if she could not buy a little bit of love. The stepmother happened in the store, heard the call of the child's soul and straightway opened her heart to her, becoming thereafter almost a real mother. The slides tell the story in a very interesting manner, for the child is so cute that one could not help but bestow upon it the deepest affection.

"TAKE ME WITH YOU, CUTY, AND FORGET TO BRING ME BACK."—That listens well. Surely with such lyrics, catchy music, and illustrations posed for by such charming models, this song cannot help but become at once popular at picture theatres. It has a light, breezy air that cheers, dispelling all gloom and displeasure. Published by Leo Feist.

"THE HONEYMOON GLIDE."—Words by Jos. H. McKeon; music by W. Raymond Walker; published by Harry Von Tilzer Pub. Co. This song has an air that is a hummer. Hear it once and you'll want to hear it six times, as well as join in on the chorus. It is one of those songs that make you feel lively and happy. The slides, posed for by a very pretty little miss and handsome youth, are very striking. Novelties, as usual, a-plenty.

"UNDER THE YUM YUM TREE."—Words by Sterling; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Von Tilzer Music Co. We have all been there—under the yum yum tree—gazing into loving eyes and whispering soft foolishness, etc. The song surely is a good one, one of Von Tilzer's best, which is saying a good deal. Each slide in this fine set has the stamp of quality, the quality which gives the work of Scott & Van Altena a certain character which we all know.

"MY DIXIE DREAM."—Published by Harry Von Tilzer Music Pub. Co., New York; words and music by Earle Taylor, writer of "My Southern Rose." Another Southern song by this author that bids fair to have the same popularity as his preceding one. The slides for this song are in typical Scott & Van Altena style—cleverly posed, more than excellently colored and containing novelties galore. The models too are good looking and very graceful.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON.

"ONLY LOVE DREAMS."—Words by Edward Madden, author of "Starlight," "Under the Hebrew Moon," etc. Music by Dorothy Jardon, who is making such a hit in "Madame Sherry" at the New Amsterdam Theatre. Simpson says this is the most beautiful set of slides he has ever made, that the photography is wonderful, the posing exceptionally graceful, and that the coloring would delight the heart of an artist. Novelties are here, indeed. Shapiro is the publisher of this tuneful love ballad.

"IN THE LITTLE TOWN ACROSS FROM JRESEY CITY."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham; published by Shapiro. This is a very pleasing novelty song in which a New York youth tells his companions of the charm of the "Little Town" in a very clever set of lyrics, which are set to exceedingly good music, as is characteristic of the melodies of this very popular author. Simpson has chosen his subjects with care, showing the country home, the trip on the ferryboat, New York Bay and Hudson River, the wonderful skyscrapers, the Singer Building, etc., as well as Herald Square in the grip of a blinding snow storm. This is not a "faked" slide, but a real photograph. Many other scenes of city life.

"DON'T YOU WISH THAT IT WAS SUMMER."—By Bayes and Norworth, the vaudeville headliners, who are now making the hit of their careers with this melodious number, taking any number of encores at each performance. Simpson has made a beautiful set of slides, both artistic and illustrative, of the theme of the story. The girl is exquisitely dainty and the coloring beautiful.

"YOU ARE THE IDEAL OF MY DREAMS."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of "All That I Ask of You is Love," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night." Published by Shapiro. This is one of the ballad hits of the year. After all, heart interest is the thing, and no one can escape the touch of sentiment conveyed by this delightful song as sung by Frank Morrell at Hammerstein's Theatre. The slides Simpson has sent out for this song are beautiful. His models are well chosen and extremely good looking. The photography is excellent and the coloring beyond criticism.

"YOU AIN'T GOT THE GIRL TILL THE RING IS ON HER FINGER, AND EVEN THEN YOU NEVER CAN TELL."—By Al Bryan and Kendis and Paley. These clever writers are known the world over for the number of sensational hits they have produced. Simpson has illustrated the bashful youth and the worldly-wise father in bright, snappy situations that are bound to create a laugh wherever shown. They are funny without being vulgar, and yet artistic, as are all of Simpson's slides, and illustrate the words of the story so well that the eye follows the action of the story without trouble, and even a poor singer could not help but make good with these pictures. This catchy little number is published by Shapiro.

"I WILL LOVE YOU ALWAYS JUST FOR AULD LANG SYNE."—Words by Robert F. Roden; music by Ed. V. Cupero. This ballad is another of Helf's hits, and is being sung with great success by that sweet singer, Tom McKenna, in Dockstader's Minstrels. Simpson has illustrated this dainty love poem with great feeling. The models are more than usually good looking, and the posing reminds one of the beautiful slides he made for the "Sunbonnet Sue" song. Coloring is extremely artistic.

LEVI COMPANY.

"WHEN THE GIRL WHO CAN'T FORGET YOU WANTS TO KNOW IF YOU'VE FORGOT."—Words by Robert F. Roden; music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills. This is one of the best songs of its kind that F. A. Mills has published in some time. The music is very pretty, as are all of the songs written by this famous composer. The models are exceptionally good looking, and the Levi Co. has turned out a good set of slides.

"SUPPOSE WE DO."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams; published by Roy E. Miller Music Co. A great spooning song with good lyrics and a very catchy melody. It is easy to play and easy to sing, and one you will like better every time you hear it. The slides are good.

"WHEN THE BLOOM IS ON THE CLOVER, MOLLY DEAR."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams; published by Roy E. Miller Music Co. A fine ballad with a good swing. The Levi Co. have done well with the slides, releasing in this number one of the best sets they have ever turned out. Scenes are very pretty and the coloring excellent.

"I'LL BUILD A FENCE AROUND YOU."—Words by Samuel M. Lewis; music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills. This is one of those simple little songs for which Mills is noted. A very catchy melody already being whistled about the city. The slides are exceptionally good and contain some great novelties. Both models are from "The Summer Widowers." now playing at the Broadway Theatre, and are exceedingly good looking, all of which go to make this the best set of slides the Levi Co. has ever turned out.

"SMILING EYES."—Words by J. Young; music by Minerva W. Fields; published by Church, Paxson Co. The title explains the story. Just a pair of smiling blue eyes. They are not the kind that hypnotize or mesmerize, but the kind that simply tantalize. Fine lyrics with a great melody. The slides are just as good and help to make this song a big winner.

"ROSY CHEEKS."—Words by Dave Oppeheim; mucis by Joe Cooper; published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. This as a real novelty song, one that will make any audience sit up and take notice. The Levi Co. have discovered a most beautiful girl, now playing in "Up and Down Broadway," who fits the title to perfection, and is sure to carry this song to a tremendous popularity. In the photography, posing and coloring of this set the Levi Co. have reached the highest point in the art of making song slides.

"STELLA, DEAR."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams. A beautiful march ballad with a melody that is simply fascinating. Easy to sing and one that stays with you. The slides are very beautiful, both models being exceptionally good looking, and the photography and coloring excellent. A first class set of slides in every particular.

"ANY LITTLE GIRL, THAT'S A NICE LITTLE GIRL, IS THE RIGHT LITTLE GIRL FOR ME."—Words by Thomas J. Gray; music by Fred Fischer; published by M. Shapiro. This is the biggest hit published by M. Shapiro within the last three years, and the melody is being whistled by almost every street urchin. The slides are good.

"JUST FOR A GIRL."—Published by M. Witmark & Sons. This song is the biggest number that the Witmark concern has put out in some time and is an absolute hit. Slides are first class in every particular, and are beautiful. The demand will be heavy owing to the extreme popularity of the song, and you should place your order immediately.

"JESSAMINE."—Words and music by Frank B. Williams; published by Shapiro. A pretty love ballad surpassing many of its kind published heretofore. A set of slides by Levi that delight the audience.

WHAT THEY SAY ABOUT SIMPSON'S SOLAR SCREEN.

That the Simpson Solar Screen is doing all that is claimed for it, and more too, is evidenced by the many letters of commendation received almost daily by Mr. Albert L. Simpson, 113 West 132d Street, New York City, manufacturer of the screen. Mr. Joseph F. Driscoll, general manager of the Nicoland Amusement Company, operating five theatres in New York City, writes:

"Your screen does much more than you have claimed for it in every way. We have given it the most severe tests and are surprised at the results. Our pictures are beautifully brilliant and clear notwithstanding that our place is illuminated so that a newspaper can be read anywhere throughout the house. Many people have called to see this screen and expressed their surprise at the wonderfully beautiful resuts obtained. We consider your screen an indispensable improvement to our theatre and performances, and think that no manager of motion picture theatres would hesitate purchasing one if he could see the remarkable results we have secured from it."

Thatcher & Son, managers of the Star Theatre, Bay City, Mich., write: "We have just purchased one of your screens from the National Vaudette Film Co. and are more than pleased with the article, as it will show a bright picture in a lighter house than I expected it would when I ordered it."

The Simpson Solar Screen, invented by Mr. Simpson about a year ago, makes possible the projection of motion pictures and stereopticon views in a well lighted room. It is in demonstration at leading film exchanges, and is regarded as an excellent remedy for the oft criticized "dark house."

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Labor Day has come and gone and while at this writing it doesn't feel much like Fall the first Monday in September is accepted as the harbinger of Fall, and pretty soon the leaves will begin to put aside their greens and put on the Autumn tints, all of which is said to call attention that the Vitagraph Company will present some Fall "pippins," tasty and varitinted with all the richness of the "Life Portrayal" which is the favorite crop at all times.

"The Three of Them," which will be put upon the market Saturday, September 10, will meet the tastes of everybody; "The Sepoy's Wife" will be an agreeable surprise on Tuesday, the 13th; "Two Waifs and a Stray" will fit in just right on Friday, September 16, just before we see a "Lunatic at Large" on Saturday, the 17th.

A lady in Cleveland, Ohio, wrote the Vitagraph Company expressing her appreciation of some of its pictures. In part she said: "A few nights ago a play was produced by your Company entitled 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' Most everyone having read the book, of course, were anxious to see the pictures. Your production was appreciated far more than pen and ink could write. Your play was touched up by the theatre having a quartette sing 'My Old Kentucky Home,' 'Good Night,' 'Way Down Upon the Swanee River' and 'Nearer, My God, to Thee' in their appropriate places, and the effect was splendid.

This is an evidence of what appropriate music will do even with a good picture like "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and it is gratifying to learn that the exhibitors appreciate the suggestions given in the Vitagraph bulletin for the introduction of these musical selections.

The Vitagraph Company came near losing one of its employees by drowning last Tuesday morning. Mr. Edward Atkinson, of the costume department, was in bathing off a yacht at Coney Island, and while swimming a false tooth plate in his mouth became lodged in his throat. He was unable to breathe and sank for the third time when Mr. Jos. J. O'Donnell, a friend who was on the yacht, saw him sinking, jumped into the water and rescued him.

About six years ago Mr. Atkinson saved Mr. O'Donnell from drowning, and they feel that they are both willing to quit even.

NEW HOUSE FOR OWEGO, N. Y.

Rollins Perry, well known as a motion picture man in Owego, N. Y., has rented the Fair store on Main street, and will soon convert that place into a first-class motion picture theatre. When the place is completed, it will seat in the neighborhood of 400 persons, while there will be standing room for a couple of hundred more.

A new fire proof booth is to be installed that will come up to the requirements of the building and fire departments. There will also be installed a new Powers machine.

COLUMBUS DISPATCH APPROVES EDUCATIONAL PICTURES.

The Film Index is indebted to John W. Melchoir of the Ohio Film Exchange, Columbus, Ohio, for the following extract from The Dispatch of his city:

BIBLE TEACHING BY MOVING PICTURES.

Some time ago The Dispatch called attention to the fact that moving pictures were being used to tell the story of the efforts of the missionaries to spread Christianity in foreign lands. Such views were shown in this city and they brought to the mind, more vividly than words alone could ever do, the conditions of the missionary work. It cannot be doubted that they were useful in swelling the subscriptions for the foreign work.

Now a Detroit Sunday school is teaching the Bible by these same novel aids. How far the project has advanced is not made quite clear, but it is evident that the opportunities for this sort of Biblical instruction are many and good. Scores of the unusual incidents related in the Bible would readily adapt themselves to this treatment by moving pictures. Scenes that have stamped themselves indelibly upon the mind by means of words alone would be almost sensational in picture. And how striking the effect! There would be need, of course, of care not to treat the subject irreverently, and that, perhaps, would be the difficulty. But if it could be done without a hint of sacrilege, many more persons would be reached by the instruction and something would be done toward rescuing a popular art from a harmful use.

THE TRUTH!!

IT is interesting to note the consternation and havoc that the remarkable growth of the LEVI COMPANY, Inc., has caused in the song slide field. From the one who terms himself the world's largest song slide producer (?) comes a big howl, a wild cry for help, like a ship sinking in the boundless deep.

Through perseverance, youth, push and energy, the LEVI COMPANY, Inc., in the last six months has more than trebled its business, and in its upward march to success has naturally incurred the enmity of those whose business has suffered accordingly.

In Announcement, Cartoon and Special Advertising Slides we have always been the acknowledged leaders, and through untiring efforts we have succeeded in putting our song slides in the same place, so that they compare favorably with the best and better than the next best. One big music publisher after another gave us their songs to illustrate, and as our business increased, naturally some one else's decreased, and whether the attack on our business integrity is really due to the incident referred to, or spiteful jealousy, we will leave to the judgment of the trade to determine.

A true statement of the facts in the case is as follows: Four months ago one of our photographers required a picture of an airship to complete three slides of his song. While he had access to hundreds of such pictures, to save time he thoughtlessly copied the airship from another slide. The slides were ready for shipment before the head of this Company found out what had been done, and immediately ordered the destruction of those slides. While we were responsible for the mistake of this employee, still our action in immediately destroying the slides proves conclusively our feeling in the matter. This was not compulsory on our part, as the slides bore absolutely no resemblance to the originals, the scenes pictured being entirely different.

Four months later, when reparation was demanded, it was given upon receipt of a signed release with a full understanding that the matter was to be dropped. Now, in a last dying effort he seeks to regain his lost imaginary prestige. This statement is the absolute truth, and we do not propose to enter in a mud slinging contest with him, as our time is entirely too valuable.

Our reputation for honesty and square dealing has been so firmly established, that we know a petty attack of this nature will receive no consideration from any source whatever.

Could any concern have acted more honorably under similar conditions? We leave it to you to judge.

On another page of this issue will be found our new song releases for this week. Three big numbers, A1 songs and A1 slides.

We take this opportunity of replying to the many inquiries from the trade for full information on our "CURRENT EVENTS" slides. By special arrangement with the American Press Association, we have secured exclusive right to reproduce on lantern slides their copyrighted pictures of all the big news events of the day. The set always covers the event, and the slides are colored the same as song slides. On each slide is a caption or a full printed explanation of the picture, therefore no lecture is needed. With each set of slides two display posters are given free. Extras, five cents each. You can rent them from your exchange, or if you prefer, place your order direct, so as to insure your showing them first in your community. The price is $6.00 per set, within the reach of the smallest exhibitor, and as an added attraction, is worth ten times the amount we ask for them.

What They Say About BIO Carbons

G. D. Strong, of the Crystal Theatre, Minneapolis, is an expert operator from away back. He can tell a good carbon as far as a shipwrecked sailor can sight a sail. He asked us for samples of BIO Carbons, saying that he was then using the best carbon he had been able to find but was ready to be "shown." Here is the "come-back."

"In a previous letter I mentioned that the 'perfect' carbon had not yet been found. Yes, it has, and it is the BIO. As a proof of its good qualities, let me say that my assistant operator, who comes in at 5 p. m., after running two shows—not knowing that I had BIO Carbons in the lamp, called my attention to the fact—'Had I noticed what a beautiful, steady, white light we were getting?'

"Rest assured I shall boost and recommend your carbons all over the Northwest. They are what every operator should have."

CASUAL COMMENT

WORD comes from headquarters that actions have been commenced in the United States Circuit Court against the Thanhauser and the Champion motion picture companies for using cameras that infringe the Edison patents, and that the evidence in hand points to probable injunctions.

It is about time.

We do not make that observation in criticism of those upon whom the arduous task of securing evidence against infringers devolves, but because the integrity of the motion picture business is seriously menaced by the acts of the several pirate picture concerns which have been permitted to carry on their illicit operations unmolested. It is to be hoped that there will be no let up, now that the campaign has been started anew, and that a wholesome fear of the law and the rights of patents will be recognized and respected.

IT would be unreasonable to contend that all the crooks, petty larceny thieves and second story men, temporarily out of work, had turned their attention to the picture business, but if there is any other line of human endeavor that is just now suffering from the activities of business dead beats and crooks we have not heard the matter mentioned.

It is a singular commentary upon the business morals of the country that men who desire to be considered reputable (some of them do) should persist in barefaced theft of things that belong by law to others and affect to believe that they are really shrewd and clever, and entitled to commendation.

It is from this class of honorable gentlemen that the greater part of the so-called independent pictures come. Is it any wonder that that product should be particularly low in moral tone and degrading?

It is because of the unspeakable rot and piffle in the way of pictures these persons are producing that compels us to say: It is time action was taken against them.

That speedy and effective results will be obtained in each and every instance is the wish and hope of every ligitimate and self respecting man in the picture business.

NO more sympathy or consideration should be wasted upon the renegades of the picture business than one would confer upon the burglar who broke into one's house or the pickpocket who went through one's pockets in a crowd. By no stretch of imagination can their operations be considered legitimate.

Some of them have pretended to be using cameras that did not infringe the patents of Edison; but theirs is only a pretense. Like the successful burglar they are out of jail only because they have been clever enough to escape detection.

Most of them owe large sums of money for merchandise bought and never paid for. If they were to pay their debts today they would not be making pictures—they would be broke. Most of them are doing business with money belonging to their creditors.

Therefore we say it is high time they were brought to book.

JOHN COLLIER RETURNS FROM EUROPE.

Educational Secretary of National Censorship Board Much Impressed With English Motion Picture Theatres—Says They are Superior to Ours.

John Collier, educational secretary of the National Board of Censorship of New York city, who for the past month has been in England and continental Europe studying the motion picture situation, returned home two weeks ago and has just made his first report on picture conditions as he found them on the other side of the Atlantic. During the time Mr. Collier was in Europe making his investigations, he evidently found the work quite a treat, for on his homecoming he looks well "browned" by the summer sun and he is feeling in the best of health and ready for a hard winter's work.

Mr. Collier's real purpose for making a European trip was to hunt for motion picture improvements from an educational standpoint, also to look for pictures that would be of benefit for school purposes and to get a line on how the motion picture theatres were conducted abroad.

To Mr. Collier the English methods of conducting motion picture theatres were by far the most practical as well as logical. The houses were generally well lighted and ventilated and in every way models. Pictures were the thing and the only thing the manager of the house offered or the audience expected. There were no daily changes of films; every one went to see first-class pictures, and as all the programs contained an outline of the story of the films being run there was always something of special interest to be learned by returning and seeing the picture twice or even three times. If the picture pertained to an historical event, the programs contained two or more pages explanting the different historical scenes.

Perhaps one of the great features that attracted first-class audiences was the excellent music that was to be heard. The orchestra of a motion picture theatre in England, declares Mr. Collier, is a feature that American managers should adopt. There is none of the out-of-tune piano and snare drum and other traps that are found in the picture houses on this side, but real first-class music, such as you hear in any first-class theatre or cafe.

While in London Mr. Collier found many of the large picture houses run on what is called the "American Idea," yet, in none of the theatres did he find any vaudeville or illustrated song singing. The English managers have found out that, for the admission they charge for motion pictures, the price will not allow them to run vaudeville of merit and, unless a manager does that, he will have to eliminate the vaudeville end of the show. Again, motion pictures in England, is patronized by all classes, and owing to the character of the audiences, picture houses must be run in a most strict manner.

On the day that Mr. Collier arrived in London, there was opened one of the newest and most up-to-date picture houses in London, at which there were some members of Royalty present. Next day the London papers told of the opening as a society event.

One thing that was most noticeable to Mr. Collier was the manner in which the exhibitor got his films. As a matter of fact, the middleman or jobber, is a "dead one" in England. The present day exhibitor unusally purchases a film outright and after he is through with it, sells it to some one else or more often sends it to some exhibitor in India or South Africa. Very often a number of exhibitors in different cities will purchase several films in different parts of Europe and will run them at their houses for a whole week at a time. These films being first run, each house will have a feature film for a number of weeks. Sometimes when there are not enough films to go around the exhibitor, to get the first run, will pay more than his associates, the second exhibitor then pays more than the third and so on.

It will also be interesting to mention the fact that the English exhibitor does not conduct his house on the cheap show method of rushing the performance, then driving his audience out and hustling a new one in. On the contrary, he makes his theatre a sort of gathering place where the men and women of the neighborhood can come to enjoy themselves. In some of the first class places, tea is served to the ladies and often beer or ale can be purchased by the men. In all of these places Mr. Collier found the audiences quiet and orderly. Everybody has a good time and all enjoy the show.

English exhibitors take great care in the projection of pictures. The titles must be correct and the projecting machine in perfect order. His house is light, which prevents eye-strain caused by dark houses.

Mr. Collier found no censorship boards in the English cities as there were no need of them. There is a Parliamentary act governing all such shows and the authorities see that the law is carried out.

In France and Belgium Mr. Collier found the houses conducted much on the order as in England. What struck him most as being featured was the large orchestras. Each theatre tried to outdo the other in the musical line. In continental Europe there was not as much stress laid upon the sanitary conditions as in England.

CHANGE OF PROGRAM

On that day they will release in place of the program already announced. "The Hustler Gets the Coin," 384 ft. (a good com edy) and "The Hand of Fate," 607 ft., a fine spectacular production. They express regret for any inconvenience caused the exhibitors and exchanges.

EDISON DISPLAY AT BOSTON.

Boston Mechanics' Exposition Will Have Big Exhibit From Edison Laboratories.

The most talked of exhibit at the Boston Mechanics' Exposition, to be held in Mechanics' Building, Boston, Mass., beginning October 3 and running to the 29th, is the big display of Edison laboratory products. It will eclipse any display of its kind ever shown at an industrial exhibit, surpass in size, completeness, novelty and attractiveness of arrangement all other exhibits of the exposition. The exclusive privilege to exhibit the products of the Edison laboratories, Edison Kinetoscopes, films, and accessories, Edison phonographs and records, Edison storage and primary batteries, and Bates automatic numbering machines was secured by the Edison people early in the present year, and they succeeded in contracting for the choicest and largest space in the Mechanics' Building—the stage of Grand Hall, the largest of the eight halls in the building with a seating capacity of 10,000. On this mammoth stage, eighty feet long by forty feet deep, which dominates the entire hall, the marvels of the Edison laboratories will be shown.

The entire stage will be enclosed by means of an ornamental front with plate glass windows. The enclosed floor space immediately in front of the stage has also been reserved and it is in this space that a complete line of Edison Kinetoscopes and accessories will be exhibited.

Over the main stairway to the stage an oil painting of Thomas A. Edison, 25 inches by 30 inches, the work of a noted Boston artist, will meet the gaze of visitors to the exposition. This entrance will be used for admission only,, the two side entrances being reserved for purposes of exit.

Above this main entrance and cleverly concealed in the decorative scheme will be placed a fireproof operator's booth, from which Edison motion pictures will be projected upon a screen at the rear of the stage. The stage, which will accommodate 600 persons, will be transformed into a pretty theatre for this purpose, and seats will be provided for the accommodation of the Edison Company's guests. Light will be obtained from an enormous incandescent cluster suspended from the ceiling, and a special ventilation apparatus will be placed in the dome of the stage. Shows will be given at regular intervals daily and will no doubt help to make the Edison exhibit the most popular and frequented point of interest in the exposition.

A platform 28 inches wide and 3 inches high will run around the wall spaces of the stage and back of the plate glass windows and front, upon which the various Edison products will be displayed and demonstrated. A large sum of money is being expended on both the exterior and interior equipment and decoration of the stage.

The attendance at this exposition for the past five years has averaged 25,000 daily, more than half a million during the entire exhibit, and these figures are expected to be exceeded this year as all the roads running into Boston have made especially low excursion rates during the exposition.

Sales Manager John Pelzer will be in immediate charge of the Edison Manufacturing Company exhibit.

A JOLT FOR THE INDEPENDENTS

Bills of Complaint Filed Against the Thanhauser Company and the Champion Company for Infringing Upon Edison Camera Patents

SEVERAL months have passed since any action has been taken in the United States Courts against the infringers of the Edison Camera patents. To the independents it looked as though the Motion Picture Patents Company had abandoned the fight and had decided to let them alone. As a result a score or more of pirate picture companies have been organized and some of them have attempted to make pictures. Other independent or piratical concerns like the "imp" company, Kessel and Bowman's "Bison" company, the Thanhauser company and Pat Powers' company, have gone on increasing their plants and making pictures without fear of molestation.

It has been and still is claimed by these pirates that they are using non-infringing cameras. There was a lot of talk at one time about the Bianchi camera and many pretended to be using it, but when the facts were ascertained it was discovered that the Bianchi was only a blind; that infringing cameras were being placed in Bianchi boxes, or that parts of infringing cameras were being attached to Bianchi cameras. In other words, the Bianchi camera was merely a "stall" to cover the use of some form of infringing device.

While almost everyone in the business knew that these various forms of evasion were being resorted to by the so-called "independents" it has been no easy matter to secure evidence of the illegal operations that would serve to bring the pirates into court. In one case the infringer has his camera mounted in a covered wagon. In all cases the camera has been guarded most carefully, no one being permitted to approach it when it was not locked up in a safe. In this way, at great trouble and expense the pirate picture men have succeeded thus far in escaping detection. But it is a long lane that has no turn, and while the pirates have been industriously guarding their illicit operations, the Motion Picture Patents Company has also been quietly at work securing evidence against them. The first evidence of this quiet activity is announced in the commencement of actions against the Champion Company and the Thanhauser company.

Bills of Complaint for infringement of the Edison Camera patent No. 12037 have been filed against the companies named in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, in New York City and, from the evidence presented in the affidavits it is believed that there will be no hesitancy on the part of the Court in granting the injunctions asked.

It is said that this is just the beginning of a series of suits to be brought against a number of infringing picture men and which will follow closely upon the heels of the actions mentioned. It is also reported that action will soon be taken to punish several of the infringing concerns against whom injunctions have already been secured. One thing is certain, that several and severe jolts are about to be handed to a number of the so-called "independents" who have felt secure in their unlawful operations.

NEWARK HOUSE WILL BE A BEAUTY.

Frederick C. Young, manager of the Elite theatre, in Market street, Newark, N. J., has secured a ten years' lease on the up-to-date motion picture theatre erected by the Lowy, Berger & Finger Company, at the southwest corner of Clinton and Jelliff avenues.

The theatre is a one-story brick structure measuring 30x85 feet. The exterior trim is of stucco with decoration in gold and white relief. The interior has a seating capacity of 300. The building is of fireproof construction with concrete floor sloping with a three and a half foot drop to the stage. There are two exits and six windows on the Jelliff avenue side. Three ventilators insure an ample supply of fresh air. The auditorium is fitted with opera chairs.

The theatre, which will be known as the Clintonia, is intended by Mr. Young to present only the highest class of pictures. It is estimated that when the building is fully equipped it will represent an outlay of about $8,000.

FIGHT PICTURES DRAW WELL AT NEW HAVEN.

The pictures of the Johnson-Jeffries contest which were shown at the Grand Opera House, New Haven, Conn., last week, proved to be one of the largest drawing attractions that the house ever had. All during the week the house was crowded to the doors, with a first-class audience.

While the pictures were being shown, there were no comments made that would cause any unfavorable discussion. Sporting men who knew and have followed the game merely stated that it was a case of "you can't come back," and it was for that reason that Jeffries went down to defeat.

GOOD KALEMS COMING

A Serious Drama and a Western Comedy for Early Release

IF the Indian pictures of the Kalem Company have gained renown for its name there is surely something to be said of its dramatic and comedy pictures, scenes from two examples of which are here given.

In the dramatic subject, "The Heart of Edna Leslie," the Kalem players prove that they are capable of dramatic work of the most dignified and serious nature. While the title is not illuminating, it serves to identify the picture, the story of which is that of a young girl who promises to marry a distinguished foreign diplomat to please her mother and then finds that she is in love with just a plain American boy.

When the Baron discovers the girl's faithlessness, he denounces her in the presence of the other fellow, who also turns her down as being fickle.

Prostrated by the shock, the girl has a siege of brain fever, which leaves her mind a blank. Here the young man with whom she was in love repents having deserted her and helps to restore her memory by rehearsing some of the scenes of their first lovemaking. The plan is successful and there is a happy ending to the story.

A number of very pretty settings and backgrounds, together with good photography, combine to make this subject most pleasing.

In the way of good, rollicking Western comedy "The Education of Elizabeth" is an excellent picture. It is a little different from the usual Western pictures in that the action is a bit subdued and the scenic effects more pleasing. The cowboys are good—some of them are real cowboys—and the old ranchman is a fine character.

Elizabeth, daughter of the ranch owner, is sent to school in the city and later returns a finished product of a girl's boarding school. She has forgotten none of her early training, however, and joins the cowboys in extending a welcome to a young man and his mother from the East who have come to pay her a visit. There are some good laughs in what happens to the "tenderfoot."

Elizabeth's education is really completed after a few lessons in lovemaking which end in her betrothal to the good-looking cowboy with the approval of all hands.

MR. THURSTON BUYS NICKELODEON.

George Thurston, of Santa Rosa, Cal., and a prominent business man, has purchased the Nickelodeon from the Columbia Amusement Company and took possession September 1. F. T. Martens, of the Columbia Amusement Company, came up from San Francisco, accompanied by Manager Ray Crone, and the deal was closed August 29.

The Nickelodeon is one of the popular places of amusement in this city and splendid pictures have been shown there in the past, and Mr. Thurston intends to keep up the reputation of the place and have nothing but first-class pictures.

ANOTHER PICTURE HOUSE FOR LOS ANGELES.

A one-story building, to contain nine stores and a motion picture theatre, will be erected at the southeast corner of Broadway and Eighth street and on Eighth street, between Broadway and Spring street, Los Angeles, Cal., for Fred Barham and associates.

There will be two stores and the theatre on Broadway, with a frontage of 50 feet; seven stores on Eighth, with a frontage of 322.88 feet and occupying the entire block between Broadway and Spring.

The two-story building at the southwest corner of Eighth and Spring will be remodeled and made a part of the new structure. It has a frontage of 50 feet.

The one-story building will be faced with cement and be made first-class.

"AULD ROBIN GRAY"

A Poetic Scotch Picture—A Vitagraph "Life Portrayal"

HERE is something unusual in its depths of sentiment, in its strength of characters and its humanly natural conditions and situations. The story is taken from an old Scotch poem and the picture is no less a classic in its homely touches than the poem.

From the very start we are caught in the grasp of its power when we are introduced to "Jamie" and "Jenny," the loving twain. This is followed by the gypsies stealing the cow and breaking the old father's arm in the struggle. "Jamie" asks "Jenny's" parents for "Jenny's" hand in marriage; he has already won her heart. "Jamie" has no money and the parents in preference for "Auld Robin Gray," who also loves "Jenny," gently remind him that he has neither cot nor coin wherewith to support their daughter.

"Jamie" goes to sea to make and save money enough to claim "Jenny," his own true love and loved one. "The father couldna' work; her mither couldna' spin," and the daughter was obliged to work both day and night with but poor recompense. Then "Auld Robin ray" came courting her, helped her parents and asked her to marry him for their sakes, for he has enough and to spare for all of them. She cannot give "Jamie" up, and although he has been gone for over a year she still loves him and hopes for his return.

At last a report is posted that the good ship on which "Jamie" sailed has been wrecked. For pathetic strength this scene where the townfolk gather round the chandler's shop is unsurpassed; the Scotch coloring bears the scent of the Highland glades and is characteristic as the thistle, it is a fine touch of realism. Poor heartbroken "Jenny," supported by "Auld Robin Gray," presents a strong emotional picture that tells the heart of the story.

Mourning the loss of her sweetheart, she is urged by her father and mother to marry Robin Gray, and so she gave him her hand tho' her heart was at the sea. "Auld Robin Gray" was a good man to "Jenny," and she was a good wife to him and happily they lived in their own little cottage notwithstanding she often thought of "Jamie" and what might have been.

It happened that the good ship on which "Jamie" sailed the sea was wrecked, but the lad was saved, and after many days of travel he reaches his native heath and, like a ghost, appears before "Jenny" and asks her to marry him. She can scarce believe she sees aright and does not realize that it is her lost one until she finds herself clasped in his arms. She tells him that she cannot be his wife now that she is married to Robin Gray. She kisses him and tells him to leave her lest she prove untruthful to her husband and her marriage vows, declaring, "I'll e'en do my best a good wife to be, for 'Auld Robin Gray' is a good man to me."

This picture can be truly accepted as a lamp of genius and life, presenting a most brilliant display of marvelous beauty, radiant with human interest.

BRILLIANTLY LIGHTED EMPIRE OPENS.

Bridgeport's Popular House a Blaze of Light on Opening Night—Labor Day.

The Empire theatre, corner of Main and Gilbert streets, Bridgeport, Conn., which opened Labor Day night, is now conceded to be one of the most brilliantly lighted houses in the country. Manager Dobbs, during the summer, had installed more than 1,200 electric lights, and when the current is turned the whole block around the theatre was a blaze of brilliancy.

The house is most artistically decorated. From its handsome front of stucco finish in old ivory and gold right through to the footlights is one dream of beauty. The foyer is most beautifully decorated, each end being paneled with an appropriate art subject in old gold and ivory, which completes the color scheme with the interior of the main auditorium. There are many decorations which add to its beauty.

The interior of this handsome edifice is reached through two wide entrances, each of which is served by a separate ticket office. There are over eleven hundred comfortable opera chairs occupying the orchestra, first balcony and also an upper balcony, every seat in the house commanding a perfect view of the stage, without obstruction by lights or other inconveniences.

The lighting system is one of the finest, thousands of incandescent lamps being in use. In addition to the regular seats there are four handsomely equipped boxes, two of which are on either side of the spacious stage. The stage itself is about 50 feet wide and furnished completely with every modern convenience. The music is to be furnished by a full orchestra of six or seven pieces. On the basement floor are to be found the dressing rooms, also smoking and lounging rooms for the men while on the upper floor front is the general manager's office and very fine waiting rooms for ladies and children.

The building is absolutely fireproof in every particular and has special exits at the rear end and each side of the stage for emergency use. The decorations are in a very beautiful stucco work, tastefully colored in tints that harmonize with the soft mellow light of the many incandescent lamps, the colors being mostly light green with white and gold. There will be two changes of bill each week, on Mondays and Thursdays, and three performances each day, one at 2.30, 7 and 9 p. m. Patrons may enter at any time during the performances and stay as long as they like.

Motion pictures of the latest subjects will be seen at each performance.

By James S. McQuade

THE Jeffries-Johnson pictures have been now on exhibition for many weeks in some of the largest cities in this country. Who has heard of disorder, of riot, or of race war? Even the Hearst papers have been unable to point to or manufacture a single case of disturbance or unseemly conduct in theatres where the pictures have been shown.

Such epithets as "brutal," "degrading," etc., have been applied to the pictures repeatedly by the Hearst reporters and editors, and yet, although I have discussed the character of the exhibition with many reputable citizens who have seen it, I have never yet heard one state that the pictures were immoral or repulsive. Indeed, on the contrary, these men have expressed their surprise at the pother that has been stirred up over the Reno films and were astonished at their tameness when they had expected visions of gore and ferocity.

The whole campaign against these pictures has been one of misrepresentation and hypocrisy, not on the part of many easily led people, but on the part of the unscrupulous and disingenuous few who lead them. It puts me in mind of the story of the old Quaker and a stray dog that persisted in following him. Wishing to get rid of the poor canine, he walked out to the middle of the street, and, waving his hat excitedly, yelled, "Mad dog! Mad dog!" The end of the poor animal was swift; but the Quaker walked on, thankful that he had not been guilty of cruelty!

In this picture controversy how many people have been working tooth and nail to get at the mote in their brother's eye, wholly ignorant of the beam in their own? And how many have strained, and are still straining, at a gnat while they have swallowed a camel?

The lesson has yet to be learned by many that the minority, while they are entitled to their rights, cannot dictate to the majority, and that the majority, in order to preserve and be worthy of their rights, must insist on and protect those rights.

Pseudo Spartan Courage.

The promoters of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures had planned to exhibit them Monday last in a theatre in Cicero, at 48th court and West 12th street, just outside the city limits, and easily accessible. Much to the surprise of the manager of the theatre, he was visited by Assistant Chief of Police Doss, of Cicero, who threatened him with arrest if the pictures were shown. Doss got the cue from Chief Dzamarek, whose subservience to the bossism of newspaper man Hearst is complete. "This is a community of homes, and as long as I am in charge of the police department it will be defended properly," Chief Dzamarek is credited with saying. Dear me! What a menace; and what courage it takes to meet it!

A Pleasant Birthday Surprise.

It has remained for John Rock, Vitagraph's Western manager, to spring one of the most pleasant birthday surprises yet chronicled in film circles.

Mrs. John Rock's latest birthday rose on the morning of Saturday, September 10, and although she expected the day to be marked by fitting remembrances and appropriate tokens she was wholly unprepared for the elaborate and diplomatic preparations made for her especial benefit and pleasure by her better half.

Everyone who knows John Rock knows that he takes a delight in doing things of particular moment in a way that eschews the ordinary and well beaten paths. "The more prominent the occasion, the more original the deed" is the motto of the Vitagraph's Western hustler, and in this case John threw precedent to the winds and blazed out a trail for himself.

For quite a number of moons it has been the heart-set and persistent desire of Mr. and Mrs. Rock to have the pleasure of entertaining Mrs. Barker, of Niagara Falls, mother of Mrs. John Rock, at their home in Chicago; but all their efforts failed until John put on his film-thinking cap and determined to go it alone and make a feature hit. That he dared and succeeded is the reason for this birthday article.

How he did it is not my purpose to state in detail, but that he did it was evidenced by the pleasure of my meeting Mrs. Barker some hours before Mrs. Rock knew of her presence in Chicago, though the secret was in Mrs. Rock's grasp on Saturday morning, September 10, had she only known it.

Out at Fox Lake, the telephone rang, and Mrs. Rock answered it. Little did she know, as the summons from the other end of the wire called for Mr. Rock, that the man's voice heard was only a proxy for that of her mother, who waited anxiously in the Vitagraph's office, in the Schiller Building, to get in touch with her son-in-law, who was doing his best to outwit her daughter and his own wife.

In Henrici's, where I chanced to meet Mrs. Barker and Mr. Rock, I was favored with a peep at the sparkling three-stone gem which Mr. Rock had in readiness to supplement the nuptial ring on his wife's finger on this joyous occasion, and I fully felt the significance of the remark made by him that Mrs. Rock, much as she might esteem it, would value the surprise of her mother's presence still more.

Later I learned that a delightful birthday party, previously arranged by John's foresight, was held and that a most joyous event had been participated in by the favored ones. In addition to Mrs. Barker, the guest of honor, were Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Beadell, Mr. and Mrs. Fred McDoud, of Fox Lake, and Masters McDoud, Beadell and Barker.

The birthday cake; which everyone pronounced a masterpiece of confection and frosted art, was fashioned and prepared by Mrs. B. W. Beadell. The last reports received showed that all who had partaken of it were doing well.

Successful Demonstration of Edison Model B.

Arrangements were made by John Hardin, Western manager of the Edison Company, with the management of the Pastime Theatre, on East Madison street, for a demonstration by the Edison Model B machine at that house all day Monday, September 12. Mr. Hardin and John L. Hough, traveling salesman for the machine, were present during the test, which gave very gratifying results.

From 9:30 a. m. until 10:30 p. m. the demonstration lasted, and during that time 26,000 feet of film were run off, which, allowing for the acts of vaudeville interspersed, meant that the machine was steadily grinding for eight hours and forty minutes. The steadiness of the pictures was favorably commented on by quite a number of exhibitors who had come on invitations sent out by Mr. Hardin.

The Pastime has the longest throw of any theatre inside the Loop, requiring a projection of 110 feet, and the pictures in this instance were marked by their steadiness, clearness and absence of flicker. Two reels of pictures were used and four acts of vaudeville, the latter being run for a fixed period each.

Mr. Hough commented on the steady attendance at this theatre, which kept up in full capacity volume throughout the day. A marked feature of these continuous exhibitions is that there is not an intermission from 9:30 a. m. until 10:30 p. m. and that no slide is thrown on the curtain during that time.

Pathe's Manager Swings Around the Circle.

K. W. Linn, Western manager of the Pathe Freres, slipped out of town on Sept. 3, and did not return until Monday, Sept. 12. It was only after the tabulation of several telephone calls, placed on my desk, that I, when "in" succeeded in catching him "in" and then I learned, for the first time, that he had been doing the great Southwest and had returned safe and sound with the story of his peregrinations.

Mr. Linn made the first leg of his travels from Chicago to New Orleans, direct, thence he sped to Houston, thence from the bayous to Dallas, from which city he turned his face northward to God's country. And when I found him in his offices at 35 Randolph street, he looked as if he had not turned a hair, notwithstanding the Budweiser and other alkaline waters encountered during the trip. All of which bespeaks the ready adaptation of youth to the vicissitudes of climate, water and what-nots.

Conditions in New Orleans.

Mr. Linn's six months' absence from the Crescent City had produced little change. The old landmarks were the same, with here and there the signs of progress in building and improvements. One of the recent structural changes was the erection of a new picture theatre on the site of the old Fabacher restaurant, on St. Charles street, near Canal street. This handsome little theatre, the Bijou Dream, built by J. E. Pearce, of the Imported Film & Supply Co., seats about 300 people. Its neat, attractive front, tasteful interior and cosy appointments are well worthy of its name. Besides, the excellence of its ventilation reduced the rigors of the then prevailing hot weather to a tolerable condition, and rendered it an enjoyable retreat for those who sought dreamland solace amid licensed pictures. At least this is the manner in which the Bijou Dream appealed to Mr. Linn, and, according to his story, to as many others as could find seating room within its artistic borders.

Mr. Linn, who is conservative in his observations as well as in his estimates, tells me that a noticeable progressive movement was evident in licensed exhibitors' circles, not only in the increase of attendance but in the better quality of the exhibitions. Not only this; the personnel of the audiences in licensed houses was of a higher standard. The most cultured residents were represented among the patrons. In contradistinction, Mr. Linn declares that the status of independent business, both of the exchange and exhibitors, remains unchanged, for the six months that have passed since his headquarters were transferred to Chicago.

Mr. Pearce, of the Imported Film & Supply Co., was absent in New York on business at the time of Mr. Linn's stay in the city, but A. Shear, assistant manager, informed him that the volume of business now being transacted by the exchange has reached the highest notch yet touched by it, and that a greater number of exhibitors is now being supplied with film than at any time in the history of the exchange. Mr. Shear also stated that a large volume of independent business had been recently absorbed by the Imported Film & Supply Co., as independent exhibitors find that the better and more intelligent classes of patrons demand the licensed product.

The Outlook in Houston.

Houston was next visited, where Mr. Philippe, the local manager of the J. D. Wheelan Film Co., of Dallas, Tex., and W. C. Opitz, who runs a general moving picture supply house, were called upon. Licensed business both exchange and exhibiting, were found by Mr. Linn to be fairly good in the Bayou City, but the probabilities are far ahead of their present realization.

Dallas as Picture Center.

In Dallas Mr. Linn was warmly received and hospitably entertained by J. D. Wheelan, owner of the J. D. Wheelan Film Co., and was treated to a number of motoring tours in a Renaud car, which at the time was being subjected to a series of demonstrations for Mr. Wheelan's benefit before purchasing.

In Mr. Linn's opinion there is ample room for a few first class licensed theatres in all the important towns in Texas, including Dallas, Houston, Fort Worth, Galveston and San Antonio. It appears also, from certain rumors abroad, that a large corporation is being formed at present by Texas capitalists to engage specially in the building of a circuit of high class moving picture theatres, embracing the cities already mentioned. The only drawback to the scheme, it is said, is the uncertainty prevailing just now of getting the proper licensed service for the houses; but when that is fully assured operations will begin at once.

The moving picture business in Texas is not at all in a satisfactory shape. The irresponsible "independent" exchanges and exhibitors have played havoc with prices and licensed business in consequence suffers from heavy handicaps. Moreover, the tremendous area of the State and the lack of easy railroad communication in wide sections of it make it impossible for the licensed exchanges at present established to take care of the business from the present distributing points.

Take, for example, the Pan-Handle of Texas and the middle western part of the State. These sections have not as yet learned what high class licensed films mean. Nothing but junk—"independent" junk—has ever been shown there. This junk is shipped by the junk exchange to exhibitors hundreds of miles away, two or three weeks' supply in one shipment, with the result that each of these exhibitors become a subrenter, making fabulous profits of small investments.

Mr. Linn is of the opinion that Wichita Falls and Amarillo would be strategic points which might be utilized beneficially as distributing centers for licensed film. This bringing of the distributing center closer to the section to be supplied would make it more possible to make a profit out of the rental business. A large portion of the film used in the sections referred to is comprised of commercial product and this Mr. Linn believes could easily be supplanted by the licensed product.

Dallas as a center cannot supply these sections, because of the great distances, which cause considerable loss of time on films rented and thus deprives the exchange of profits. And, furthermore, if an exchange rented films to an exhibitor in these far away sections it would be at the mercy of the exhibitor, who would hold the goods as long as he pleased and subrent them to others.

Mr. Wheelan, who owns the only licensed exchange in Texas, is a prominent capitalist, of Dallas, well known throughout the State. He has the reputation of being an able, enterprising and conservative business man, and he has absolute confidence in the great future in Texas for the licensed business.

Departure of Essanay's Western Company.

The Essanay Western Company of 25 people, in charge of G. M. Anderson, left for the West Thursday evening, Sept. 15. The impediments and equipment of the organization was conveyed in a specially constructed Essanay 60 foot baggage car, in which can be stowed 12,000 lbs. of baggage.

Mr. Anderson informed me that the company will go through to Colorado Springs, Montana, where the first stop will be made. There trapper pictures, Western subjects and a Hank and Lank series will be produced. Just how long Colorado Springs will remain the headquarters Mr. Anderson could not say, but, after leaving that point, the company will work for a time in the vicinity of Yellowstone Park, the Grand Canyon, etc., after which eastern Washington, in the neighborhood of the Coeur de'Alene region, will be visited to get the locale for several feature Western pictures.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Selig's comedy film, "The New Moving Picture Operator," which was released Sept. 5, has proved a big laughing hit wherever it has been shown. The film is in big demand and many extra prints have been sold.

A. G. Spencer, formerly city and traveling solicitor with the Standard Film Exchange, resigned his position Friday, Sept. 9, and is now employed in a similar capacity by the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street.

H. H. Colburn, manager of the Orpheum, Burlington, Wis., was in the city last week, and reports everything very promising in his section. Mr. Colburn speaks very highly of the electrical articles by Mr. Hallberg, now running in the Film Index. He tells me that he reads the articles with great interest and profit, and praises Mr. Hallberg for the clearness, simplicity and comprehensiveness of his treatment of the subject. Mr. Colburn states that the Crystal, also a licensed house in Burlington, and managed by Mr. Westberg, is doing a fine business. Its service is furnished by the Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee. Manager Westberg ran "Uncle Tom's Cabin" as a whole series, recently, and showed to excellent business.

W. F. Lynch, Western manager of the Kalem Co., stoutly affirms that the "Conspiracy of Pontiac," the story of which is built around the fall of Detroit in 1763, and which will be released Sept. 23, is one of the biggest feature films yet gotten out by his company. Mr. Lynch tells me that the uniforms and costumes employed in producing this film are all historically correct. The demand for this picture is already large and includes quite a number of extra prints.

The Colonial Theatres' Co., of Joliet, Ill., has just opened up a new house, the Colonial, in Ft. Wayne, Ind. The capacity of the new house is 800, and straight moving pictures and songs form the entertainment. Indeed, this is the policy of the company in all its houses, vaudeville being rigorously excluded. Henry Odenthal specially attends to the booking of the houses on this circuit, at the offices of the General Film Co., 85 Dearborn street.

H. E. Wright, proprietor and manager of the Family theatre, Elkhorn, Wis., visited the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street last week, and made arrangements for a special film program for County Fair week in his city.

W. A. Peterson, manager of the Colonial theatre, Bloomington, Ill., was a visitor last week, and called at the General Film Co.'s offices, 85 Dearborn street, on his way to look over the condition at the Colonial theatre, Rockford, Ill. A higher quality of film service was contracted by him for the latter theatre. He reports satisfactory business at the Bloomington house.

W. H. Cadoret, proprietor and manager of the La Petite theatre, Kankakee, Ill., was a

EDISON FEATURE SUBJECTS

One From Canada—Another Bumptious and a Pastoral Comedy

ANOTHER of the Edison Manufacturing Company's Canadian pictures will shortly be released under the title "More Than His Duty." This subject pictures a supposed episode in the routine of duty of a member of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and pictures bits of the scenery of the Northwest country.

The hero is a private in the mounted service who is in love with the daughter of his superintendent. In the superintendent's family is a spendthrift son, who seems always to be getting in debt, depending upon the generosity of an indulgent father to get him out.

In the course of events a postoffice is robbed and the superintendent, learning of the private's love for his daughter, sends him after the robbers in order that he may distinguish himself and thus earn his bride.

Taking the trail, the private succeeds in chasing the robber to earth among the mountains, but is compelled to shoot him in order to make the capture; but when he gets his man he discovers that it is no other than the superintendent's son, the brother of his sweetheart.

The young man's wound proves not to be serious, the bullet having merely pierced his arm. The private binds it with a handkerchief and gets the boy home, where he is gladly welcomed.

When the private comes to make his report his reception is not so hearty. He was unable to capture the robber, so he says, and the superintendent demands an explanation which is not forthcoming. The girl is there and would comfort her lover in his distress, but the father forbids; his daughter may not marry a failure.

Matters look bad for the lovers when something impels the girl to seek her brother. As she enters his room she observes him washing his wounded arm and picks up the handkerchief which bound the wound. This she recognizes as one she gave her lover some time before and the fact that her brother was the robber whom her lover could not capture dawns upon her.

Returning at once to her father's office with the telltale handkerchief, she attempts to tell her suspicions. But the lover prevents her and takes the handkerchief, determined to conceal the criminal if possible. Upstairs the brother, believing his crime detected, decides to shoot himself. The sorrowful group downstairs are suddenly startled and rush up to find the boy dead upon the floor.

Though plunged in deepest sorrow by the death of his son and the realization that he was a criminal, the father gives his hand in gratitude to the private of the R. N. M. P. who did "More Than His Duty."

The story is adequately interpreted by the players who have slighted none of the dramatic incidents, telling the tale so clearly that there is small need for explanatory titles. Good photography and some interesting scenic backgrounds complete a really excellent dramatic subject.

SCENE FROM "THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER."

BUMPTIOUS, HE PLAYS BALL.

Those who have followed the career of that now famous comedy character, "Mr. Bumptious," will be interested to learn that he is about to appear in the role of a star baseball player. It is not our intention to detract from your pleasure by giving a detailed description of this picture now, but, take it from us, this is the best of the "Bumptious" series up to now. The accompanying illustrations may give you an inkling of what's coming, but when you see "Bumptious" in action—well, you'll wonder how he escaped with his life.

A RURAL COMEDY.

If you have lived in the country, have walked four or five miles to call upon some farmer's pretty daughter and have fallen into the water just before you arrived, soaking your Sunday clothes, you will be able to get at the very bottom of the humor in the forthcoming Edison comedy, "The Farmer's Daughter."

In the first place, it is in order to say that the little girl who plays the name part of this picture is a "peach." She has appeared in a number of the Edison comedies of recent release, but never to better advantage than as the farmer's daughter. When you see her in this picture, you'll not blame the fellow who wanted her all to himself for playing the trick he played on the others. But there are several good laughs for your patrons in this picture, so don't fail to get it for them.

PILAR-MORIN IN PANTOMIME.

Mlle. Pilar-Morin presented an example of "the silent drama" before an audience composed for the most part of members of the theatrical profession, at Liberty Theatre on Friday afternoon, Sept. 9th. "L'Enfant Prodigue" by Michel Carre was the piece offered, the story being that of a young son who steals his parents' money and elopes with a pretty laundress who discards him for a wealthy roue when his money is all gone. The boy finally returns to his parents but is disowned by his father who will have none of him. To redeem himself he joins the army.

Pilar-Morin presented the part of the son; the other characters were taken by J. Ardizone, the father; Regina Weil, the mother; Nellie Grant, Phrynette; H. Scarborough, the Baron; and J. Kilgoor, the servant. Eugene Bernstein presided at the piano.

Readers of The Film Index for the most part have seen Mlle. Morin in a number of Edison subjects and have a good idea of the character of her work. The picture play is necessarily shorter than L'Enfant Prodigue, which was given in three acts and in greater detail than would be practical in a picture, or than we are accustomed to. But it was none the less interesting, possibly more so, because pantomime calls for a lively exercise of the mental faculties in order to grasp the meaning of each gesture and expression.

From the demonstrations of the audience, which was at times in the nature of an ovation, it must be concluded that Mlle. Morin and her company succeeded in making themselves understood. Throughout each movement was followed with closest attention. The work of Mr. Bernstein at the piano was in the nature of an interpretation and illustrated the importance of competent piano players with motion pictures.

It is Mlle. Morin's desire to present pantomime on the American stage and the demonstration of the Friday afternoon led her to express the belief that the American audience was capable of understanding and appreciating her work. In view of the past few years of training the American public has obtained in picture theatres it would seem that Mlle. Morin should have no trouble in making her self intelligible without the use of spoken words.

Speaking for ourselves we found the entertainment most delightful and believe that it would be a pleasing diversion from the usual offerings of the dramatic stage.

MISS ETHEL CLAYTON

Plays the Leading Female Role in the Essanay's Western Racing Play, "The Tout's Remembrance

In the Essanay Company's big Western dramatic release of this week, "The Tout's Remembrance," released Saturday, September 24, a distinct feature will be the reappearance of Miss Ethel Clayton in the leading female role in this play.

Miss Clayton will be remembered as the heroine of many of the Essanay's dramatic films issued last fall, namely, "The Brothers," "Justified," "Gratitude," "The Twelfth Juror," and others. In this film she attracted much attention and gathered a strong following of favorites among the picture fans.

Miss Clayton is one of the most fascinating and one of the most thoroughly enthusiastic actresses who has ever appeared on the moving picture screen. In both comedy and drama she plays with excellent feeling and a convincing manner. She is perhaps one of the best known actresses who has posed for motion pictures and is familiar to playgoers all over the country.

In "The Tout's Remembrance" Miss Clayton plays the daughter of the country storekeeper, with whom "Bullets,," the reformed tout, falls in love and who is the inspiration for his reformation. There is a delightful love story which ends, however, when another suitor for the hand of the storekeeper's pretty daughter recognizes "Bullets" as a tout of whom he had been a victim and tells the story to "Bullets' " employer.

"Bullets" is discharged, but his sweetheart promises to be true to him, and as a symbol of her constant love and that she will wait for him she presses a $20 goldpiece into his hand and tells him to let it be the foundation of his fortune.

Later "Bullets" returns to the track, gets a sure thing and plays the twenty. His luck turns, for in this race his horse brings in the money.

The story ends with a scene a few years later when "Bullets" returns to his sweetheart and there is a happy reunion.

Miss Clayton's work in this subject is exceptionally fine and her reappearance in the film will undoubtedly be looked forward to with eager anticipation by the picture fans.

NEW THEATRE FOR SCRANTON, PA.

Plans for a new first-class motion picture theatre have been received and approved by Managers Burgess, P. E. Kilcullen and James A. O'Malley, of Scranton, Pa., and it now looks as if Susquehanna street will be adorned by another playhouse by the beginning of the holidays. The house will cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $6,500 and will be the finest picture palace in the "Coal City."

The building will be 36x60 feet in size and two stories high. It will be of stone and cement construction, with an ornamental front. The skeleton construction of the theatre will be of steel and the main floor will have a seating capacity of 400. The balcony will seat probably 275.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 3.—The amperes flowing through a circuit or machine are equal to the voltage, divided by the resistance in ohms.

The resistance in ohms of a circuit or machine is equal to the voltage divided by the amperes flowing

The voltage at the terminals of a circuit or machine is equal to current in amperes flowing multiplied by the resistance in ohms.

The watts consumed in a circuit, machine, incandescent or arc lamps are equal to the current in amperes times the voltage at the terminals where the test is made, excepting for alternating systems having "inductive" resistance.

In our next talk, we will discuss the different kinds of current as made and sold by the electric lighting companies for theatres.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 4

The Generation of Different Kinds of Electric Currents.

There are two kinds of electric current used for practical purposes, which may be designated as follows:

(1) Direct current.

(2) Alternating current.

Either one of which may be used for electric lighting, heat and power.

Direct Current.

Direct current also called continuous current flows in one direction only and has always two fixed poles, one called "Positive" designated by (+) the other "Negative" designated by (—).

Direct current may be produced in several ways, the most common, by means of the electric battery, which through the action of acid on metals produces electricity in small quantity suitable for telephones, medical batteries, fire alarm systems, door bells, etc., or by means of an electric dynamo or generator driven by a steam engine or other power, as is the practice in the regular electric power stations.

Figure (1) illustrates an ordinary electric battery usually composed of a glass jar in which is placed two metal elements like zinc and copper, for instance, and the jar is then partly filled with a fluid composed of sulphuric acid and water in some cases. The action of the acid upon the zinc causes a chemical change to take place which generates a current flowing from the zinc to the copper, but at the upper end of the electric element or electrodes the current flows from the copper to the zinc making the copper the positive terminal.

There are many other forms of batteries, for instance, the one used for electric bells in which the elements are made of zinc and carbon with a solution of salamoniac surrounding the elements. You are undoubtedly acquainted with this form of battery as it is extensively used for door bells, etc.

As already stated, where a large quantity of power is required the chemical method is not practical, therefore, a power plant like that illustrated in Figure 2 is substituted.

An electric power plant is usually composed of four distinct parts:

(1) The boiler.

(2) The steam engine.

(3) The dynamo or electric generator.

(4) The switchboard.

The illustration shows in a simple way such an installation.

The direct current electric generator produces electricity by revolving its armature at high speed under the influence of the magnetism in the stationary magnetic pole pieces or "field," as it is usually called.

Electric generators are now made in all sizes from the smallest up to 3,000 kilowatts. These large ones requiring engines of 5,000 horsepower.

From the generator the current is brought through large copper conductors to a switchboard in the power station where it is distributed over as many switches as required to circuits running to different parts of the town or city.

Upon the switchboard, which is usually made of marble, there is mounted protective fuses or automatic circuit breakers, switches, volt meter and one or more ampere meters. There is also included a field rheostat for each generator by means of which the voltage may be increased at the power house when the load is heavy in order to overcome the losses or voltage-drop in the feed wires, or to lower the voltage when the load is light in order to maintain it as constant as possible at the theatre or other point where the current is used.

Figure 3 gives a diagramatical illustration of an electric generator and a 2-wire distribution system in its simplest form operating a motor, incandescent lamps and arc lamps. The illustration indicates the names of the principal parts of the system and how connections are made.

We have already learned that the further the current has to be transmitted, the greater the drop of voltage in the wires, therefore it takes larger wires to carry a given quantity of amperes a long distance and this is also one of the reasons why the field rheostat for the generator is necessary at the power house in order to raise the voltage of the generator to overcome the line losses and it is one of the duties of the dynamo attendant to keep the voltage at the proper amount at all times by means of the field rheostat.

SUMMARY.

The battery is only suitable for small and intermittent work.

Where large current supply is required it becomes necessary to make the electricity by a dynamo electric machine driven by an engine or similar power.

Next week we will discuss the three-wire distribution for direct current.

The Oath and the Man

A Story of the French Revolution

This picture shows the tyranny to which the peasant class of France were subjected. The lord held his tenantry in abject slavery, satisfying his capriciousness to whatever length his whims carried him. Here is shown an instance where he took possession of one of his tenants' wives, brought her to his palace and made a lady of her. The outraged husband would have killed them both but for the old village priest, who made him take an oath he would not, impressing him that vengeance belonged to the Divine Master. Later when the revolution breaks out the guilty couple surely get the punishment they justly deserve, and not through violence at that. She learns a bitter lesson, for her covetousness has brought shame, terror, poverty and isolation. The production comprises a series of the most beautiful scenes ever photographed.

BIG GAINS IN PICTURE SHOWS

Boston Picture Theatres Seat Over 400,000 Weekly —Increase is Steadily Growing

People must have amusement—there is no question about that general statement. But thoughtful people are agitated over the quality of amusements provided for theatregoers in Boston. The drama committee of the Twentieth Century Club has just published a report—in book form—of amusements in the "Hub" for ten weeks this winter. The report says:

"Existing motion picture shows now seat 402,428 persons weekly. By the end of another year this class of amusement houses will probably accommodate 510,428 spectators each week, exclusive of Sunday performances and of other smaller picture shows that will undoubtedly spring up during that time.

"The figures show that to-day Boston has weekly accommodation for 608,238 persons. Within a year this provision will be increased to at least 750,238. For the ten weeks reported upon the total seating capacity of these theatres was 6,082,380. To this sum must be added 372,522 seats to be deducted from the total of the regular theatres on account of the performances like "The Jolly Bachelors" and "The Follies of 1909," which were only vaudeville. This would show a total of 6,454,902 seats for ten weeks of vaudeville, burlesque and picture performances!

"To offset this there are ten regular theatres with weekly seating capacity of 151,135 seats per week as against 608,238 vaudeville, burlesque and motion picture show capacity.

"For the ten weeks these theatres actually showed a total capacity of 1,020,751, making deductions for omitted performances and vaudeville. Add the Boston opera house, with a weekly capacity, estimating five performances, of 13,590 people, for the six weeks, the actual number during which opera was performed, the capacity was 81,540 seats. The ten weeks' total for legitimate drama and opera would then be 1,102,291.

"Taken with the total of 6,454,902 seats for vaudeville, burlesque, and picture attractions, the grand total seating capacity for all kinds of performances was 7,557,193, for ten weeks in a city having an estimated population of 625,000!"

Concluding with a discussion of the question of morality, the committee has this to say:

"Only a few years ago, when the first so-called 'barefoot dancers' came to Boston, an attempt was made to head off or prevent the performance, not from any immorality in a dancer appearing in bare feet, if such were her wish or the desire of the management, but merely because it was evidently the beginning of a further breaking down of those barriers that separate the audience from the performer upon the stage.

"This suspicion has been more than realized. In a comparatively brief time, about a year, there has been a perfect deluge of dancers appearing with a less and less amount of conventional apparel, and the fact that the most slightly dressed among them have been those that have appealed to the most intelligent and refined audiences, does not alter the physical aspect of the case. Those who keep in mind the progress of the theatre sit back and wonder what is next in store.

"The entertainment regularly found at some classes of theatres does not tend to improve or refine the moral sense, in case any still exists in the spectators. In some cases it appears to be distinctly the intention of those directing or responsible for the performance to debase or destroy such a sense."

Further, the report declares, "the recent efforts made by a few citizens to prevent an objectionable play revealed the fact that the present law is totally inefficient in providing any proper control over theatrical presentations.

"Under a properly worded law, making theatre licenses responsible for the performances given, making these licenses revocable in the same way every other license issued by the city or any of its departments is revocable, and making it possible to apply the criminal law as it exists on the statute books for other licenses to the theatrical licensee, immediate retribution would overtake those who offend against public morals, and the closing of a theatre for one day would mean a monetary loss to both the licensee and to the company playing the house that would act as a most effective deterrent to any other house or company likely to come under a similar ban."

NEW THEATRE PLANNED.

From a source believed to be reliable, it is learned that operations are to start in the fall on a modern theatre to be constructed on Ocean avenue, between Second and Third avenues, Asbury Park, N. J., where the roller toboggan was formerly located. It is understood the plot has been leased through the Milan Ross agency to Walter Rosenberg, manager of the Casino theatre, who, it is said, is to build the new playhouse.

Mr. Rosenberg is to begin work in the fall of transferring Central hall, on Mattison avenue, into an up-to-date motion picture theatre.

"A CLOSE SHAVE."—Mr. Marc and his wife are at breakfast when the butler announces an early caller and tenders his master a card bearing the name of Mr. Bunco. When Marc hurries into the reception room he is greeted by a gentleman of prepossessing appearance, who, after a warm handshake, introduces himself as the agent of the Silver Sucker mine. He has heard that Mr. Marc is seeking a profitable investment and was advised by a friend of Mr. Marc's to see this latter. The gentleman offers other credentials, but the mention of his friend's name is enough for the unwary Marc, and he refuses to put the gentleman to such an inconvenience.

At length it is arranged, and Marc informs the gentleman that if he will call at his office at 2 o'clock they will close the deal.

Mr. Marc wears a beard, and on his way down town he suddenly resolves to shave. And a half hour later when he bumps into an old acquaintance on the street this latter refuses to recognize him, much to Mr. Marc's amusement. At his office when he enters his stenographer looks at him strangely and tells him abruptly that Mr. Marc has not arrived. And it is some time before the young lady can be persuaded that this clean-shaven chap is her employer.

At 2 o'clock the agent for the Silver Sucker is on hand and the deal is closed, Mr. Bunco leaving the office exultantly with a large-sized check, while Mr. Marc is the possessor of some extravagant looking stock certificates which could not possibly be worth less than 5 cents each.

At the bank Mr. Bunco is refused payment on the check and is advised to bring Mr. Marc over to identify him. Shortly after the two gentlemen enter the bank, but the cashier, a personal friend of Mr. Marc's, stares at the little man peculiarly and suspiciously and desires to know what sort of a sucker he is thought to be.

Mr. Marc is in a rage when, after he has visited Smith, a real estate man of his acquaintance, he is told to get out. He meets with even sorrier treatmen when he calls on Brown at this latter's office. Here the janitor is called in and Marc is thrown out the window into a rain barrel.

In a rage Marc goes home to change his clothes and to tell his troubles to his wife, who, at first, is also skeptical about his identity. Finally, however, she volunteers to accompany her husband to the bank and identify him.

A strange thing happens when they are about to enter the bank. Mr. Bunco is being ejected by the watchman and is seized by two policemen who "identify" him as "Con" Coe, alias George Stick, wanted for bogus mining deals. The picture ends in Mr. Marc receiving his check and congratulations from the cashier of the bank.

"A FLIRTY AFFLICTION."—Pretty Molly is afflicted with a peculiar nervous disease and after having tried many doctors is finally referred to a certain great specialist, who has had success with cases similar to her own. To briefly describe Molly's ailment would be in stating that the muscles of her throat and neck were uncontrollable, causing her to throw back her head in a way resembling a person beckoning to another.

Molly goes to see the doctor, who expresses himself able to cure the case and prescribes certain medicine. But as Molly turns to go the unruly head is thrown back and the old M. D. is almost convinced the young lady is flirting with him. As Molly passes through the reception room where one or two young gentlemen are waiting to see the doctor, the peculiar nod is again repeated and the young fellows, each believing the nod to be an invitation, rise and precipitately follow her out.

On the street Molly causes more excitement when she appears to solicit the company of a dignified lawyer, who, nevertheless, likes her looks and tags on after her until he is summarily dismissed with the threat of arrest for annoying a perfectly respectable young lady.

An innocent mail man is the next victim, and he is similarly dispensed with.

An old chap in the company of his wife is also beguiled by the unfortunate girl's peculiar nod and receives a sound berating not only from her but from his watchful spouse.

Even Hauss, the little base drummer of the German band, is bewitched by the involuntary Circe and gets his drum smashed for his trouble.

The climax comes when Officer O'Rourke falls a victim to the young lady's nod and is told that his services as a protector are certainly not needed. During the argument the captain, O'Rourke's superior, comes on the scene and orders the patrolman on his way.

The girl has reached home and she thanks the captain for his protection. But as she opens the door those unruly muscles work again and the captain accepts the invitation. This is the last hope, and the poor girl slams the door in the captain's face.

"THE TOUT'S REMEMBRANCE."—"Bullets" Brown, the hero of our story, is a race track tout, and a true type of this particular parasite. Our first introduction to him comes when we find him plying his trade upon an unsophisticated country lad who has come into his majority with a good bank roll and a tendency to get rid of it in short order. "Bullets" puts him next to a good thing in the opening scenes in the betting ring and of course the young fellow loses. When he encounters the tout again, after learning that he has been buncoed, he makes dire promises of revenge.

"Bullets" is not a tough, and a few days later when he receives a letter from his mother begging him to give up his evil life, he makes a solemn resolve to steer clear of the track, get employment and make a man of himself. Some few days later he wanders into a country store and startles the proprietor by asking for employment. The old man looks his applicant over and then nods his head. "Bullets" and he shake hands and the young fellow, anxious to be at work, pulls on a pair of overalls, picks up a broom and begins setting the place to rights.

He is busily engaged at this when the door opens and Agnes Dudley, his employer's daughter, enters and stares amazedly at the new clerk. "Bullets" is also confused, and the two young people pause hesitatingly until the storekeeper enters and introduces them.

It is not long before Agnes and "Bullets" are in love with each other. On a day a few weeks after the new clerk's arrival he endeavors to pop the question when the young fellow, whom we will recognize as the sport who had been buncoed by "Bullets" at the race track, enters unobserved by the two. "Bullets" finally stammers a proposal and takes the girl in his arms. Then the young man in the doorway turns on his heel and hurries angrily away.

Dick Gleason, who has also been a suitor for the girl's hand, hurries off to find old Dudley, and when he communicates his story of the impudent clerk's love-making, Dudley is enraged and hurries back to the store, where he summarily discharges the unfortunate clerk. But Agnes begs him to wait and as he bids her goodby she slips a large gold coin into his hand and tells him to let it be the foundation of his fortune.

A few weeks later finds "Bullets" still out of work, hungry and tired of life. It is then that the Tempter visits him when he picks up a telegram, dropped by a noted race track man, with the advice that Gadfly, a 500 to 1 shot, is booked to make a killing that day. Could any one resist so tremendous a hint?

That afternoon finds "Bullets" in the betting ring with a ticket showing that he has played Gadfly with $20 to win $10,000. These scenes are thrilling and tremendously strong. Gadfly gallops in a winner and "Bullets," loaded down with the coin of the realm, leaves the track, hardly able to realize his big rake-off.

The closing scenes show him back to the country store again, his proposal to the girl and his acceptance by the old storekeeper.

"AN UNSELFISH LOVE."—This picture, while telling a most interesting story, at the same time will give the spectator an idea of the marvelous possibilities in the western part of Canada for those who have brain and brawn.

Our hero having been refused because of his lack of wealth by the father of the girl whom he loves, determines that he will overcome that difficulty and sets out to make a fortune by farming in Western Canada. He leaves his home carrying the love of the daughter but no hope is held out to him by the father that he can ultimately succeed. We see him after his arrival at Strathmore, Alberta, where he takes up farming on the advanced scale with which it is carried out in this part of the country. Among his earliest acquaintances is a lady by no means unattractive but of the type and age which is popularly designated as an "old maid." She immediately takes a great fancy to John and on every occasion of their meeting presents him with a few flowers. At first his kindly nature feels only amusement but after a while her intentions become quite unwelcome, particularly as visit after visit to the village post office finds no letter waiting for him from his loved one at home. Shitting back to the town which he left we find that Mr Willmere, the father of the girl, Mabel, now has very ambitious plans for his daughter, because of the fact that a very wealthy suitor, Mr. Moore, has entered the field. The old man's determination goes so far that he actually prevents a letter which Mabel has written John, from being sent. We see John in the various stages of his successful farming continually being followed by the spinster lady, Miss Gray. It is evidently a bad case so far as she is concerned. Finally matters come to a climax. Mr. Willmere being determined that his daughter shall marry the man of wealth, causes to be inserted in the local newspaper an item to the effect that John Martin having succeeded in Strathmore, has become engaged to a Strathmore belle. The sight of this item temporarily at least turns Mabel's love to pique and the other suitor being coached to make advances at just this time is accepted by her. Soon afterwards John, on one of his frequent visits to the village post office, finds to his great delight a letter, but his joy is turned to the deepest grief when upon reaching the attractive home which he has made for Mabel and opening the envelope he finds it to be a wedding invitation announcing the forthcoming marriage between Miss Mabel Willmere and Mr. Henry B. Moore. In utter despair he sits down and starts a heartbroken letter to her but is interrupted in the middle of it by the approach of Miss Gray. Feeling that his nerves cannot stand the strain of meeting her just at this time, he hastily leaves the room leaving the half-written letter with the wedding invitation and Mabel's portrait on the table before him. Miss Gray entering with her customary floral offering and finding the room vacant, soon discovers the articles on the table. In a few moments the whole truth is revealed to her and here her noble heart, though beating under an old-fashioned exterior, becomes evident. It takes her but a few moments to decide that she will try to prevent two lives from being wrecked and she starts immediately east. Just before the wedding day she reaches Mabel's home, whom she is fortunate enough to find alone. The meeting is naturally an embarrassing one but even over this embarrassment her unselfishness and true nobility triumph and it is not long before she has acquainted Mabel with the fact that John in far-off Western Canada is pining for her. From this point Miss Gray urges upon Mabel the necessity of prompt action and after argument, prevails upon her to immediately start for John's farm. In order to escape observation Mabel leaves surreptitiously by means of a ladder placed against her window. Going back to Western Canada we find John at the close of the day's work heartbroken, with a vision before him of Mabel being led to the altar by Mr. Moore. He goes to his lonely home and thinking what might have been, bows down in grief under his misfortune. At that moment Miss Gray enters. He greets her politely but coldly and not being able even yet to completely repress her fondness for him, she offers him a bunch of roses which she has brought. This is too much for his overwrought nerves. Brushing the flowers angrily away he intimates to her that he is in no condition to talk with her. Miss Gray, heartbroken herself but ever true to her purpose, goes to the door and beckons, at which Mabel enters and going to John lays her hand gently on his shoulder. Thinking that it is Miss Gray he angrily brushes the hand aside but upon turning discovers the one person whom perhaps he never expected to see again. Thus the two lovers are made happy and while we can rejoice in their happiness and their acknowledgement of it to the "old maid," our joy is almost overpowered by the sympathy which we feel for her as she fervently wipes her eye and turns away. However we may take consolation in the fact that, though she has lost what she most coveted, she has at least two friends who will be true to her through life.

The story is an unusual one played largely by our stock company and each part being rendered most effectively. As an interesting story in itself it should prove a deserved success but coupled as it is with the scenes of the great farming development of Western Canada it is bound to be considered an extraordinary film.

"ALMOST A HERO."—Here is an Edison short comedy which almost carries us behind the scenes in the moving picture business and shows us what accidents may happen in the making of a film. But it is not an industrial picture, but a real comedy with a real hero or one who is nearly a real hero.

It begins with Percy behind a ribbon counter and shows his longing to be a man of deeds and of valor. Of course his reason for this is his desire to be admired by the pretty girls who come to the counter to buy ribbons and laces from him. We see how the desire works out as he goes into training with all of the physical culture apparatus known and with prize fighters and base ball players as models to work to. He even learns marksmanship with the revolver to be sure of playing his part well when the occasion for very valorous deeds arises. And it does arise for soon we see him on the street, the accidental observer of a pickpocket plying his nefarious trade and a pretty girl the victim. Percy dashes to the rescue and seizes the scoundrel by the collar, but instead of acting as any well regulated pickpocket should do and making a desperate effort to retreat, this pickpocket stands up to Percy and abuses him roundly. He is soon joined by two other vociferous gentlemen who hurl anathemas upon Percy's unprotected head until he feels that the pickpocket is a more popular character than the honest man. Finally it is forced upon his consciousness that he has walked into the taking of a scene in a motion picture, interrupted the camera's work and is thereby making himself decidedly unpopular. He is too disgusted to apologize but swallows his chagrin over this first attempt at heroism and beats a retreat. Another opportunity soon appears, for walking in the park, he sees a young woman heavily veiled attacked by two desperados who struggle with her on a flight of stone steps apparently with the intention of abducting her. He draws his trusty revolvers and calls upon them to throw up their hands. They do throw them up, but in his direction, taking his revolvers away from him and again pointing in the distance, where he sees another motion picture camera and where he recognizes the same friends upon whose operations he had intruded only a short time before. He resolves to be more careful next time, and the next time it not long in coming. A young woman in a lonely place in the park goes to the edge of the water, stands waving her arms distractedly and then plunges into the dark depths of the river. Percy, throwing off his hat, dives in after her and, although he cannot swim, tries to drag her to shore. For the third time the motion picture people appear upon the scene, and for the third time Percy finds himself a victim of misplaced confidence. He can't swim and he is obliged to accept the help of the lady to escape from the waters, after which a friendly policeman takes him gently by the collar and leads him away, to the evident satisfaction of the motion picture people. The last scene shows a lonely country road, a young girl appears, and from the bushes a tramp steals forth. He sees a jewel upon her neck and decides that it would be well for him to possess it. He speaks to her with assumed politeness and she tries to get past him, but he stops her and invites her to present him with the jewel. She turns looking for help in all directions and then Percy appears upon the scene at the back. She calls wildly to him, he dashes down to her rescue, then suddenly the memory of past scenes dawns upon him and he stops and smilingly signs to her that he is too wise to again get into a motion picture. At this instant a burly young football player dashes upon the scene, seizes the tramp and throws him to the ground. The girl promptly embraces her preserver. Percy applauding, comes down, congratulates them upon their realistic acting and then learns to his unending sorrow that he has missed the one real opportunity of his life, that the tramp was a real one, the girl was a real one and the hero was a real one, while he was only a might-have-been.

The incidents and atmosphere of the comedy are out of the usual run and provide an endless succession of laughs leading up to the principal comic climax of the story. It's jolly good fun and is admirably played by the Edison Company, while the scenic environments are among the prettiest that the summer time and outdoors can provide. It ought to be one of the most popular short comedies of the month.

"A JAR OF CRANBERRY SAUCE."—This is the history of a blood-curdling crime showing all the harrowing details and how it was discovered by a more than brave young man who had been reading more blood and thunder novels than were good for him. The story starts with the departure for the metropolis of Silas, a farmer but nobody's fool. His wife out of the goodness of her heart insists on putting up a lunch for him in spite of his protest that he is going to stop at a first-class hotel and buy the things to eat. She wins him over to her way of thinking by putting in a jar of his favorite cranberry sauce and he takes his departure with it and a cheerful countenance in consequence thereof. Arriving in town, he is assigned to a room which has two doors. One into the hall and one to the next room. He goes down to the cafe but finds that the prices quoted opposite the things he would like to eat have taken away his appetite. He hies him back to his room and to Mandy's lunch which looks very good to him now. Meanwhile in the room next door a young man is reading his fourth penny dreadful and becoming very much excited over the story of the "Crime in Room Thirteen." He grows so nervous as he follows its progress that he gets a revolver out of his suitcase and puts it down beside himself, more to feel secure than with any idea of using it. Silas munching his sandwiches comes down to the stage where cranberry sauce is in order and starts to open the jar, but the jar refuses to do its part and a struggle ensues. In the next room the young man, deep in his reading, hears strange and unearthly sounds through the door, groans and grunts and heavy feet moving about the carpet. He becomes nervous, goes to the door to listen and then hears muttered curses low and deep. Silas is having the time of his life with the jar.

J. H. HALLBERG, - - 36 East 23d Street, New York

Finally with a desperate wrench the cover comes off but the jar itself flies against the door to the next room and the contents are spilled upon the door and sill and carpet. On the other side of the door the trembling young man is listening to the apparent struggle of a strong man with his helpless victim and trying to decide whether to shout for police and thereby put his own life in danger or to stand by and allow the crime to be perpetrated without taking a hand. And then from underneath the door sill, after he has heard the victim fall upon the floor, there creeps a red pool which adds to his certainty that he is the unwilling witness to a terrible tragedy. At this he incontinently flies and runs to the office of the hotel, reporting the case and calling the police. In Silas's room his curses are not without reason for he has hurt his finger, lost all of his cranberry sauce and is in a thundering bad temper in consequence. He decides that there is nothing else to do but go to bed and has just pulled off one of his boots when there is a peremptory knock at the door and a voice bids him open in the name of the law. Taking the boot for self-defense, he opens the door and stands confronted by two officers, the clerk of the hotel, the bellboy and the brave young man from next door. They force him back, charge him with a crime, seek for his victim and then when he demands an explanation point to the blood upon the floor. At the word blood, it dawns upon Silas that the drinks are on somebody else. Dipping his hands into the gore, he applies his fingers to the young man's mouth, much to our hero's disgust. But the evidence is irrefutable and the picture closes with his precipitate retreat before the officers and the other members of the searching party can take their vengeance upon him.

This is an ideal comedy subject for the silent drama and one that is sure to provoke mirth of anything but the silent kind from the spectators. It is good for not one laugh, but one for every second and ought to prove one of the big winners among the little comedies of the season.

"THE SALT ON THE BIRD'S TAIL."—The saying, "If you want to catch a bird put salt on its tail," is a pleasantry of such long standing it is familiar to every man, woman and child in existence. It furnishes a theme for this well drawn and lively drama of home life, a tramp's gratitude and the cordiality of the little child who loses through an accident the canary bird which was given her by her father.

A tramp calls at the child's home for a "hand-out." The mother gives him something to eat, the child provides him with a loaf of bread and sends him on his way rejoicing.

Shortly after the tramp has taken his departure the little girl tries to hang the cage with the bird in it on a nail on the porch. The cage falls to the ground and the bird escapes. Her mother is provoked and reprimands her for her carelessness.

The child, sobbing on the steps of the porch, happens to think of putting salt on the bird's tail and immediately sets out with a box of salt and the bird cage in pursuit of her lost pet. Across fields, through woods we follow the child, through flower-decked pastures and stretches of new mown hay and gorgeous "snaps" of byways and highways, that make the picture a thing of beauty and the story a panorama of interest.

The mother misses the child and goes in search of her. The girl grown tired and footsore lies down at the foot of a tree and falls asleep. The tramp is making his way leisurely through the brush and sees the escaped canary bird in the grass, cautiously approaches it and captures it with his cap, then resumes his stroll petting the bird as he goes along. He comes to where the little girl is sleeping, guesses the meaning of the salt box and the cage, decides to repay her for her kindness to him when he needed food, places the bird in the cage and hides behind a neighboring tree to watch the denouement. He doesn't have long to wait. The distracted mother coming along espies the child sleeping with her bird returned to its cage; she is astonished. The child awakens and can scarcely believe her senses. The lost are found and the smiling face of the grateful tramp adds to the happy ending of a very happy and especially good story and picture.

"THE FALSE FRIEND."—John Haven and Will Harver are working on the same job. The former is married and has a little boy, Jack by name. The latter, however, has no family ties, and is in reality in love with his comrade's wife. Working upon a roof one day, Will loses his balance and falls to the ground. He is fatally injured, and amongst his papers John discovers a portrait of his wife, which reveals the truth to him in a flash. He returns home, and after a painful scene with his wife, separates from her, taking little Jack with him. A year passes, and the husband and wife have never met again. The woman works hard for her living and sees little Jack in secret as he goes and comes from school. Jack loves his mother and father dearly, and says nothing of his meetings with the former to the latter. But one day the inevitable happens, and they both meet at the school door. Anger shows itself plainly in the face of the man, but the little lad, slipping between his parents, stands like a connecting link between the two, and for his sake John stops to listen to his wife's pleadings, and consents to forget and forgive.

"AN ARIZONA ROMANCE."—Nell's father is giving her a fancy dress ball at his Fifth avenue mansion, and Jack and Nell, who are sweethearts, are making love in the conservatory. He has just received from her a locket containing her photograph, which he swears to wear next to his heart, when a servant enters and calls Nell out. Walter and Grace then come into the conservatory, the former being dressed like Jack—as a Romeo. Jack leaves and Nell returns in time to see Grace accepting Walter and kissing him. She only sees his back, and his dress being similar, mistakes Walter for Jack. She goes out on the balcony heartbroken and on Jack's return gives him back his engagement ring and sends him away, refusing to give any explanation. Jack returns to his bachelor apartment and there finds a letter from his old chum, Bob Ewing urging him to come and spend some time at his ranch in Canyon City, Arizona. He decides to go at once, and, after giving instructions for the closing of his apartment, starts out for the West. Meantime Nell has met Grace and Walter, who announce their engagament to her. She notices the similarity of costume and realizes how unjust she has been to Jack. After a few days' consideration she decides to write him and candidly confess her mistake, but the letter is returned to her "Gone; No Address." Meantime Jack has arrived at Canyon City and the change of scene and western life are brightening him up. One day in the local saloon Jack protects an Indian girl, Little Fawn, from the enforced attentions of a Mexican Greaser, and in the affray that ensues Jack is badly shot. Little Fawn nurses Jack through his serious illness, and while he is delirious sees Nell's photo in the locket he wears round his neck. Three months elapse, and Jack, who is canvalescent, is sitting outside the saloon with Little Fawn, when an automobile comes along with Nell and her father, who are taking an auto trip through the West for the benefit of the former's health. The auto stops for repairs and Little Fawn recognizes Nell. Suddenly the machine starts, and is about to run over Nell. The Indian girl runs forward and saves her just in time, but is herself knocked over. She is badly injured and Jack lifts her to a bench and supports her head. Nell is also there, but they have not noticed each other yet. Little Fawn tells Jack to look at Nell. They both look up and recognize each other.

Little Fawn places their hands together, sighs and dies while Jack takes Nell in his arms, who explains to him her unfortunate error.

"TRIP TO THE ISLE OF JERSEY."—Disembarking at St. Helier, we proceed down King street and Queen street, watch the garrison marching out, and then take our seats in a char-a-banc. On the road we pass some charming bungalows and also obtain a good view of a field of the famous Jersey cabbages, which are specially cultivated for the manufacture of walking sticks. Plemont, one of the most beautiful points on the island, is next seen. High cliffs and curious caves, into which the sea rushes at high tide with the noise of thunder, are duly visited before we pass on to the Chateau of Montorgueil, situated on a rocky promontory. Here the fascinating pastime of gazing upon the wave-washed rocks is indulged in for some minutes, and then we continue on our way to Lecq, where a final scramble over the rocks and a glimpse from afar of the Corbiere Lighthouse ends a very pleasant trip.

"MAX IN A DILEMMA."—Max is in love with Kitty, who is willing, but whose father regards a substantial bank balance as of more importance than a loving heart. Max, rejected, returns to his chambers, and would like to die, but his courage fails him at the critical moment. He is interrupted in his reflections by a burglar. At the sight of Sykes, Max becomes inspired and offers him the sum of $500 to kill him before midnight. The thief agrees and departs. A new arrival now appears, who turns out to be a lawyer, who has called to inform Max that a large fortune has been left him by his uncle. Transported with joy, Max hastens to inform Kitty's father, and is, of course, immediately accepted, and invited to dinner. During dinner a servant announces that a visitor wishes to speak with Max. He goes to meet the newcomer, and is horrified to recognize Sykes, whose existence he had temporarily forgotten. With a cry he dashes out into the street, runs for dear life, is overtaken, and tremblingly awaits his death blow. Judge of his happiness and surprise when Sykes coolly hands him back his $500, saying at the same time that he is not going to risk his precious neck simply to do Max a favor.

"THE MEXICAN TUMBLERS."—This troupe, consisting of eight members, known as the Ramon Garcia Troupe, has executed some remarkable feats for the benefit of motion picture audiences. The picture exemplifies the agility and sprightliness of the jumpers with astonishing effect and should prove a hit.

'A SIMPLE MISTAKE."—Mr. Hallate is leaving for a trip and his loving wife is helping him to get his belongings out with him. At last everything is ready and she goes on the stoop and watches hm get into the rig. Augustus Slip, who happens to pass at this moment, sees her and, like other men of small stature, becomes deeply enamoured with the ponderous Mrs. Hallate. He goes and purchases a bouquet and, returning to the house, walks into the parlor and forces his attentions on Mrs. Hallate. She, however, will have none of him, and as he refuses to leave, flies for refuge to the maid in the kitchen. The maid happens to be entertaining her friend, Officer O'Brien, and Mrs. Hallate is indeed glad to see a limb of the law, and requests him to eject the eloquent Augustus. Meantime, Mr. Hallate has missed his train, and accordingly returns to his home. Augustus hearing him enter, hides behind a curtain, and when the officer enters Hallate is the only man in sight. Believing him to be the intruder, and refusing to listen to his explanations, he forcibly ejects him on to the sidewalk. Hallate, determined not to be ousted from his own home, even by one clothed with the majesty of the law, re-enters, and this time is thrown by the officer out of the second floor window. The express wagon arriving at this time with his trunk, Hallate, with the connivance of the express driver, empties its contents on the pavement and locks himself in the trunk and is carried up in it. Meantime Augustus had had to take refuge under the sofa. What the final denouement is when Hallate comes out of the trunk, and Augustus from the sofa, you will have to see the picture to find out. How Officer O'Brien felt when he ascertained who it was he had so misused is also not going to be divulged here.

"BIG MEDICINE."—A hurry-up remedy of the minute type destined to show to what extent one's imagination can control their destinies.

"THE SERGEANT."—A story laid in the Great Yosemite Valley during the eighties. Col. Westley has an only daughter who is the one softening influence in his rugged nature. She is fond of taking morning rides over the trails, and is usually accompanied by Robt. Adams, a sergeant at the post, and who is detailed by the father to look after her safety.

The companionship of these young people soon ripens into love, and despite the disparity of the rank of Adams and his sweetheart's father, they plight their troth. At the opening of the story we see them riding away from the post. Upon arriving at Nevada Falls, a favorite spot, they leave their horses and proceed on foot in order that they may ascend to a more advantageous height from which to view the gorgeous scenery that surrounds the grand historical Yosemite Valley.

While engaged in this pastime, an Indian renegade steals their horses, leaving them afoot many miles from the post. The evening is stealing upon them then they discover their loss and in their effort to follow the foot prints of their horses they lose their way and are compelled to spend the night in the wilderness.

The Colonel becoming alarmed, sends out a searching party that finally succeeds in finding the missing couple. Upon returning to the post the sergeant is placed under arrest despite the pleading of his unhappy sweetheart.

Now a lapse of a month occurs and we see a thrilling battle with the Indians, in which the Colonel accompanied by his daughter is cut off from the men and about to be taken by the redskins. It is at this time that Adams, only a private, shows his heroism by making a desperate dash through the lines of the enemy, rescuing the Colonel and his daughter from the murderous savages, though wounded almost to death. His recovery and promotion to 1st Lieutenant soon follow, and with the consent of the Colonel to his marriage with the lady of his choice, ends a pretty story of love, heroism and devotion to duty.

No picture ever made abounds in such a gorgeous array of scenic backgrounds. It was made in the great Yosemite Valley. What more could one ask?

BIOGRAPH CO.

"A SUMMER TRAGEDY."—Nerve is the most valuable asset of the human animal, for without it little may be accomplished in this age. Nerve is the woof from which is woven "bluff" and bluff is raiment covering odious reality. In short, the man pulling a bluff resembles plated wear, all right for a time but the plate inevitably rubs off. Clarence Topfloor is given his week's vacation with pay, and makes great preparations for his stay at the seashore. In pressing his trousers, he badly scorches them, but thanks to a long coat he is able to hide the damage, so off he starts to give the seaside belles a treat—Adonis II. While Clarence is making these preparations, Mabel is starting off on her vacation. They are, of course, unknown to each other. Mabel vows that she will return from her sojourn with an engagement ring. So you see here are two romantic souls starting out choke-full of determination. Fate is going to be busy, Mabel arriving first. She is in her room when Clarence arrives. He conceives the rest assured. Fortuitously, Wave-crest-by-the-Sea Hotel is the destination of both, idea of playing the part of a millionaire for the week just to see what happens, hence he registers as Reginald Vandergould, Fifth Avenue, New York. Well, maybe he don't stir things. Everybody in the hotel is attention. Here the "pipe-dream" begins, Mabel and Clarence meet, and, as she is also fostering an iridescent bluff, that of being an heiress, each thinks the other the real article. Down at the shore he points to a steam yacht at anchor as his, but as things aboard are in such confusion, owing to the crew being at work overhauling the "log-book," he is forced to deny her the pleasure of a visit thereon. He doesn't get it on her for an instant, for pointing to a mansion that graces the distant shore as her summer home, she gives as a reason for stopping at the hotel, the servants being house-cleaning she so disliked the taste of dust. Well, as they look good to each other, he proposes and she accepts. At this point in the romance two things happen. Clarence's time limit is up and his finances are down, so he must tear himself away, but parting is such sweet sorrow, and they leave, each other vowing eternal constancy. Once outside the land of Utopia, they awaken. Mabel visits the city drug store to quaff a refreshing flagon of cream soda, when—"discovered!" Who should dole it out but Reginald Vandergould, Fifth Avenue, alias Clarence Topfloor. Another case of Cupid working overtime. At lunch Clarence hies himself to a neighboring "Ham-and" emporium to have the festive coffee and sinkers served by the fair hands of Mabel—discovery No. 2. Their bluffs punctured, they both make the best of the worst of it—shake and become friends at least.

"THE OATH AND THE MAN."—God's justice is inevitable and unerring and it behooves the short-sighted mortal to wait and reason before he gives rein to intemperate desires for vengeance, no matter how great the grievance. The vengeance meted by the Great Master of all is more terrible in the end, and yet more ethical, for vengeance perpetrated by us, in a measure, reverts. No more powerful lesson in this has been shown than the one comprising this Biograph story. Before the revolution in France the nobility exercised a most despotic rule over the peasants, subjecting them to abject slavery. Not only did they suffer pecuniary oppression, but their humble households were invaded and defiled by the noble profligates. Henri Prevost, a perfumer, receives a call from his landlord in quest of some perfume. During his visit this nobleman is attracted by Henri's pretty young wife. Her beauty so enthralls him that he, during her husband's absence, exercises his presumed rights, and invites, or rather commands her to attend his house fete. Here he dresses her in finery and promises to make a great lady of her, so that when her husband, who finding whither she had gone, bursts into the palace, she denies him. The heartbroken perfumer at first would return to the palace and in vengeance murder both his wife and the nobleman, but the old priest stays him, by showing him the crucifix, the emblem of Christian charity and making him swear he would never kill them, indicating that vengeance belonged to God. Henri takes this oath and lives up to it. Some time later the peasants chafing under aristocratic tyranny revolt, with the perfumer a leader. The revolutionists invade the home of the nobleman, the occupants of which flee in panic. The nobleman himself, with the perfumer's wife, who is still with him, make their way to her former home, which she imagines is deserted. The perfumer enters, and upon meeting the guilty pair, sees his chance to wreak vengeance. He is about to run them through when the old priest again appears and shows him the crucifix, reminding him of his oath. He then waves back the mob, who haven't

"JEAN, THE MATCHMAKER."—Bent on having a summer vacation, two working girls hire a tent and pitch their camp on the shore of a beautiful lake amid rural and quiet surroundings. As fate would have it, two farmer lads, living with their widowed mother not far distant from the camp, are making their way through brush and lanes until they unexpectedly come onto the bivouac of the girls; mutual embarrassments are shown, and the boys, who are bashful swains, stand not on the manner of their going, making a hasty and awkward retreat.

The boys tell their mother about the two "peachy" girls, and she decides to send them some freshly cooked doughnuts, and employs the faithful dog, Jean, as a messenger, and the dog at once carries them to the girls, much to their surprise. The boys make another venture to the camp, but meet with little encouragement; they are not assertive, and their natural timidity and boorishness amuse the girls exceedingly.

The young fellows are not discouraged in their advancements, and find Jean a ready emissary in their embarrassment. She makes many visits to the camp with tokens of their respect and love. The girls are puzzled by the frequent visits from the dog and decide to discover the source of her supplies and the place from whence she comes. They sally forth, and in going encounter a cow, which stands in their way. They become frightened; their shouts for help bring the two boys and their dog Jean to the rescue. The boys now summon up courage and, when the girls tell them about the dog and their wish to learn where she came from, the boys offer them their escort and invite them to their home. The girls accept; the boys introduce them to their mother; they are invited to take dinner, and things progress very satisfactorily and happily to all concerned.

The young people go out for a stroll, leaving the mother and Jean alone. The mother begins to think that her boys are hopelessly smitten with the girls and gives way to a gloomy foreboding of a double marriage, the innocent and good old dog trying to prove herself her comforter and that she did not know she was being used as a matchmaker.

"A MODERN KNIGHT ERRANT."—Cyril, a young college student, starts out to find employment during the summer vacation to enable him to more comfortably pursue his studies during the fall and winter.

He secures work with a farmer and turns in with the rest of the hands. Living in the neighborhood is a sweet young girl named Mary, whose mother, a widow, and a lame brother make up the household. She becomes acquainted with Cyril and soon they are the best of friends, which arouses the jealousy of Tom, a big bully of a fellow, who prides himself on his ability to rub it into everybody else, and does not fail to do so whenever he gets a chance, not even sparing Mary's poor crippled brother, upon whom he wreaks the wrath of his pent-up jealousy.

He tries to bully Mary into cutting off her friendship for Cyril and accepting his attentions. Cyril sees Tom grasp Mary's arm and threaten her, learns the reason and challenges the bully to fight him. Cyril asks Mary to retire, and the two men have a fist fight, which is very exciting and strenuous, in which Cyril proves himself the master completely to the overthrow of Tom, who sullenly slinks away with the jeers and ridicule of all the boys in town.

Mary is nervously waiting to hear the issue of the battle and hoping anxiously for Cyril to win. Her brother comes, tells her Tom is completely vanquished. Mary runs to Cyril, who is nursing a sprained wrist. He is trying to bind his handkerchief around it. She offers to do it for him, and just as their hands touch their hearts respond. She throws her arms around his neck, while he enfolds her in his arms; then she breaks away and runs for the house, frightened at her impulsiveness. Cyril—well, he just looks as if he were the luckiest and happiest man in all Christendom.

"RENUNCIATION."—Love with a romance is by far more interesting than the ordinary article. While the romantic part of it is not always intentional, it is undoubtedly desirable, so, when the hero, Jack, son of a wealthy and eminently aristocratic father, finds himself in love with the heroine, a chorus girl, we find ourselves interested in the story.

The young girl is of irreproachable character, poor but ambitious to make her way in life and succeed in her chosen profession. She applies to a prominent manager for a chance to show her ability to act, and she impresses him very favorably, but he cannot give her the desired opportunity. She leaves her name and address with him for future reference.

The manager is a personal friend of Jack's father, and while visiting him Jack comes in and the conversation turns to the stage. Jack mentions his acquaintance with the young chorus girl; the manager takes her card from his pocket, saying she had applied to him for a position and he had found her a very capable and charming young lady. Jack declares his love for her and his "dad" proclaims his objec-

The father goes to see the girl and induces her to give up his son, and he suggests that she can cure the boy of his love for her by assuming drunkenness when he and the son call on her by the father suggesting to the son that he would like to meet the young lady and see for himself the sort of a person she is. She reluctantly gives her word that she will do it, hoping her loss will be Jack's gain.

The son joyfully and readily consents to his father's going to visit his sweetheart, feeling assured he will be won by her personality. At the father's request his friend the manager is invited to accompany them. Word is sent to the girl that they will call to see her. She receives the note.

With breaking heart she summons all her fortitude to her aid to give up the man she dearily loves and prepares to make herself objectionable to him. Her visitors arrive; the son is shocked and disgusted when he sees the girl apparently in a beastly state of intoxication. He silently leaves the rooms with his father. The manager lingers long enough to tell her she is a great actress and offers her a position in one of his companies.

The father cannot help but admire the character of the young woman and how honorably she fulfilled her promise to him. His managerial friend speaks enthusiastically of her superb acting, and there and then the manager makes out a contract engaging her at a good salary for the season. The father will supplement it with a present of money. Jack overhears their conversation, discovers the deception which has been played upon him, and determines to have the girl in opposition to everything and everybody.

The father and the manager go at once to see the girl; she spurns their offers of money and contract. She has lost more than fame and fortune in the loss of Jack and his love. At this moment Jack enters, tells her he knows all, and asks her to be his wife. She replies, "Not until your father gives his consent." The old gentleman is only too willing that his son should marry a woman who had acted not only well but nobly, and readily places her hand in the hand of his son, adding his blessing to his consent.

"TACTICS OF CUPID."—A finely colored film, showing the methods employed by Cupid whilst pursuing his employment. He causes two young people to fall violently in love with each other. The consent of the maiden's father has to be gained, and the young fellow puts the question to him, only to be shown the door. But Cupid is at hand with help, and by his magic he conjures up before the father a recollection of his courting days. The old man's heart is softened, and running after the unhappy lover, he brings him back and joins the hands of the two young people. Amid great rejoicing the wedding takes place, and the couple drive off to enjoy a brief but quiet honeymoon. Cupid is beautifully played by a child of very small proportions, in fact, so well that one almost fancies it is the real thing.

"SUNSET."—In this film some beautiful sunsets have been secured. The tinting throughout is in perfect harmony, and one can almost imagine that the real scenes are being shown, and the only fault to find with the film is its shortness. Similar in finish and artistic value to "Poetry of the Waters."

"THE RESERVED SHOT."—In the year 1815, at the camp of Grenoble, the old soldiers of Napoleon and the young officers of the king are banqueting.

A sensational telegram brings joy among the one and consternation among the other.

Napoleon has landed at the Gulf Juan. There the soldiers sent to stop him have refused to fight and have followed him towards the north.

An old soldier quarrels with a king's officer, blows are exchanged, and a duel arranged. Each duellist is to have one shot.

On the next day, the duel takes place, the king's officer shoots and misses. The older soldier, instead of firing, says he will use his chance at a later day.

Ten years have passed. The king reigns again in France. The royal officer has forgotten his duel. It is his birthday and his wife and children are giving to him their best wishes, when a man comes with a card. It is a card from his almost forgotten opponent demanding him to continue the duel begun ten years earlier.

The officer kisses his wife and children and leaves them in tears.

At the meeting place the Napoleonite is ready to shoot when the royal officer's little boy arrives, and beseeches the soldier to do no harm to his father. The boy's plea is successful.

"THE TIMES ARE OUT OF JOINT."—A wonderful film in which the people work and move so quickly that it makes the heart sick to think that one day we might have to do the same. A clock, in a certain family, gets out of order, and the hands develop a frightful tendency to move round at an abnormal pace. This effects the household, causing them to do likewise. The clock is taken to be repaired, and the complaint attacks the clockmaker so vitally that the repairs are done in no time. The clock, however, has not lost its power, and as the owner speeds back with it, the effect on everyone who gets near it is fearful. This film is absolutely filled with laughter-producing situations.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

"A CORSICAN VENDETTA."—A mother lies ill, and would see her son before she dies. The young man is a member of a conscript band, but in response to the urgent message conveyed to him through a shepherd boy, braves the danger of capture and flies to his mother's side. News that the bandit has left the hills reaches the authorities, and the young man hides. The soldiers are about to take summary measures and shoot the father, Matteo, when the young man gives himself up. The father is filled with thoughts of vengeance, and goes to the home of the commander of the soldiers, armed with a knife. An opportunity occurs, he alters his plans, and kidnaps the officer's little son. Matteo becomes the leader of the bandits, and the boy is brought up in their haunts. Years pass, the bandits' ravages move the government to action, and once more the officer is sent in pursuit. The bandits escape by a rope down the face of the precipice, and the soldiers, following, are trapped. The boy recognizes his father, and pleads with the bandit chief that his life may be spared. The sight of the father's joy at having

"SCENES IN THE CELESTIAL EMPIRE."—We have pleasure in announcing the publication of a unique series of film subjects which graphically and vividly illustrate not only the life and customs, the processions, festivals, pastime and industry of a country strange to western eyes, but also the varied scenery of one leading city of the empire.

A vivid picture of life in Shanghai, giving representative glimpses of both the native and European elements, which, apparently, do not intermingle freely, In the native quarter everything is typically Eastern; in the European the atmosphere is as typically Western. There is even a smart volunteer—or territorial—regiment.

"ZEB, ZEKE AND THE WIDOW."—Zeb keeps the general store in a little country town and he and Zeke have been lifelong friends. They are a couple of cantankerous oldsters, but there's a flash of youthful fire in their veins and this is fanned to white heat by the appearance of Mrs. Marion Clayton, a fascinating widow, whose physician has prescribed an entire rest from all social duties and retirement to a country town. Mrs. Clayton finds the awkward flirtations of Zeb and Zeke a relief from the monotony of novel reading and accepts Zeke's invitation to go buggy riding. This is a blow to Zeb, who hustles to the city and buys a second hand automobile. That wipes Zeke's eye, but the stubborn wreck of what was once an auto balks. Zeb climbs under the machine in the most approved motor fashion and Zeke sits beside the widow and tinkers with the steering gear. He starts the auto and there commences a wild ride, with Zeb pursuing in Zeke's buggy. Zeke wrecks the auto and then drives the widow home in the buggy, winning there and back. Zeb threatens to sue Zeke for the price of the wrecked machine and his damaged feelings, and the old friendship bids fair to be broken up when the widow gets word that her fiance is about to arrive from abroad and her physician will permit her return to the city. It's a stunning blow to Zeb and Zeke, but Zeb tears up the bill for the auto and over a couple of cigars—"five centers, the best in the case"—they talk over their love dream. Anyhow the widow was a corker and it was worth while.

"LOVE'S OLD, SWEET SONG."—Jack Bryant is one of a party of campers who are roughing it. Each man takes his turn at being cook, and when Jack is told off as chef his first duty is to go for eggs. There is a farmhouse nearby where he obtains a supply and the farmer's daughter is an attractive girl, so attractive indeed that Jack deliberately

Jack start for the city after a rustic wedding. The marriage is a shock to aristocratic Mrs. Bryant, and her son's wife is not made welcome, the more especially as it seems impossible to train her to city ways. But the mother and daughter-in-law are drawn breaks the eggs that he may have an excuse for returning for more. A third time he makes application and there is but one left. Cherrie is loath to let that go, but Jack coaxes it from her for a keepsake. The incident has served to start a friendship that terminates in marriage, and Cherrie and

KALEM CO.

"THE JAPANESE SPY."—In "The Japanese Spy" the Kalem players offer a character study which is one of the most original and expressive yet produced and the strength of the play is greatly augmented by the fact that the scenes which are supposed to be located in Japan are enacted by genuine Japanese. The purpose of the story is to show the extreme nationalism of the Japanese and to portray the willingness of every subject of the Mikado to die for his country if necessary, his death being a great honor rather than a calamity to his family.

The story opens in the office of the Japanese War Department. It is desired to secure secret information concerning the latest maneuvers of the United States Army and a volunteer is called for to go to America as a secret service agent. Baron Arai volunteers. A glance at his home life, his parting with his wife and children is given; then we find him in America in the great camp at Pine Plains disguised as a peddler. Here too the realism is carried to the limit, for the military scenes were all taken in the great instruction camp of last August, at which over thirty thousand of the leading troops of the country were each week engaged in the study of the latest war problems.

The Baron Arai secures his information, but comes under the suspicion of the United States Secret Service Department, and agents are detailed to apprehend him. He is captured just as he is about to step foot on shipboard, but when confronted with the plain evidence of his guilt he dies like a Samurai, committing hari-kari in the presence of his captors. The final scene of the production is just as unique as the others, for we are taken back to the home of Baron Arai in Japan, where we see a solemn delegation from the War Office conveying to the widow the posthumous honors bestowed by the Government to the memory of her late husband.

Like "An English Home," this picture play is bound to be of considerable discussion, for it points out a situation that has been discussed by every well

"CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC."—Pursuing their popular policy of presenting historical Indian themes with the utmost care and attention to details, the Kalem Co. offers the "Conspiracy of Pontiac."

The story, which is well known to every school child, is taken from Parkman's History, and is presented without alteration or embellishment, and in the number of people employed and in the character of the scenic mountings is by long odds the greatest Indian production yet offered under the Kalem trade mark. It will be remembered that Major Gladwynn, Commandant of Fort Detroit in 1765, has declared his love for a young Indian girl, and she had become much attached to him. At this period Pontiac was at the height of his power, and had sent emissaries about the villages of the Ottawas inciting war against the whites. The final plan involved the entry to the fort of a number of picked chieftains, each carrying a shortened gun beneath his blanket. The mission was ostensibly to be one of peace, but at a signal from Pontiac the chieftains were to drop their blankets and to massacre the whites. However, Major Gladwynn was informed of the plot by the Indian girl and when Pontiac presented himself with his delegation on his treacherous mission, Major Gladwynn was well prepared and the fort was saved.

Throughout the story is woven a love romance involving an Indian girl and Lady Jane Amherst, a young English girl visiting the fort at the time. The "Conspiracy of Pontiac" is so accurately and beautifully done that it will stand for a long time as an Indian classic and will unqestionably appeal very strongly to the school authorities as an educational subject worthy of close study.

CONCERNING BRASS EASELS AND FRAMES FOR LOBBY DISPLAY.

The Newman brass easel, a device for the artistic advertising of a picture theatre's program, is reproduced in the advertising columns of this issue of the Film Index. On it rests the brass poster frame for displaying posters. Posters should be attractvely and promimently displayed in the lobby, and this device, perhaps better than any other, will show them off to advantage. The poster frame may be hung on the side walls as well as set upon the brass easel.

The easels and frames, made in various sizes, are sold by the Newman Mfg. Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio.

WHAT THEY SAY ABOUT LEVI'S "CURRENT EVENTS."

Levi Company's "Current Event" releases are being well received by the trade, judging from some of the letters that company are in receipt of. S. A. Tischer, of the Star Amusement Co., Denver, Colo., writes: "The Dr. Crippen slides arrived O. K., also the extra J. J. slides. I thank you for your promptness. Your slides are good. The Dr. Crippen slides create more interest than the fight slides, I think. I run a great many fight films and a fight slide in my house is a surprise. Please keep me posted on anything special, as I am in the market for anything in line of novelty that will draw the 'Nicks.'"

O. V. Traggardh, of Seattle, Wash., writes: "I have received the two sets of Crippen and Gaynor slides. Think they are O. K. If you intend to release sets of this nature from time to time, kindly enter a standing order for me for one set of each."

The "Current Event" releases are an idea of the Levi Company. By special arrangement with the American Press Association the company reproduces on slides pictures taken by the association of any big event of the day—headliners in the newspapers.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The fall campaign at the Vitagraph studios has begun and there are some remarkable pictures already cast for immediate production. In addition to the familiar faces which have become so popular in the "Life Portrayals," several new actors and actresses will be seen. The whole staff are busy in preparation for the big work before them. Part of the stock company who were making seashore pictures have returned to the studio to take their places with the rest of the "stock" members.

Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, who has been combining business with pleasure on his yacht, has returned to the studio brown as a berry, with some excellent outdoor and seashore films of rare and brilliant photography.

During an exhibition at Spencer, Ind., last week, a gentleman from Kentucky who was present while the Vitagraph "Life Portrayal," "By Faith of a Child," was being shown, said to the manager as he was leaving the building: "By God (excuse the language), that's the first crying I've done for thirty years," and he wasn't ashamed of it, either. Such involuntary expressions of appreciation are better criticisms than any other, and the kind that are most valued, because they are sincere.

For ingenuity and artistic originality the Vitagraph film titles and sub-titles are most appropriate and tasteful in design. In some cases they are ornamented with natural flowers and plants, and so well arranged they look as though nature had entwined itself in the completeness and harmony of the work. Dissolving, moving and unfolding effects are employed as seen in "The Love of Chrysanthemum," all of which add very largely to the interest of, without interfering with the picture.

"Jean, First Aid to the Bashful," Tuesday, Sept. 20, is an encouragement to all bashful swains when they see how a collie dog brought about a double engagement. This picture is a grouch cure and an exterminator of the "blues." "A Modern Knight Errant" goes forth on Friday, Sept. 23, full of spur and spirit that will put life and vigor into the deadest audience. It shows how a fellow with two willing hands and a stout heart can make his way and win a charming girl. "Renunciation," on Saturday, Sept. 24, shows what a girl will do for the man she loves. In self sacrifice she beats her prospective father-in-law at his own game, wins his respect, love and the love of his son, whom he did not wish her to marry.

visitor at the General Film Company, 77 S. Clark street, last Monday, and incidentally thanked Manager Van Ronkel for the excellent service furnished. He stated that business is improving and that the fall prospects look big.

S. A. Oakley, of the Alhambra Amusement Co., was in the city last Monday and arranged with Manager Van Ronkel, of the General Film Company, 77 S. Clark street, for a higher class service. Pictures are run exclusively at Mr. Oakley's theatre, the Columbia, in opposition to several vaudeville houses, with the result that the pictures are holding their own in successful fashion. The Columbia charges 5 cents admission, whereas the vaudeville houses charge 10 cents. The Columbia is a new house and was opened three weeks ago, the returns already being away beyond expectation. This satisfactory result can be attributed to clever management and a high class picture service.

The Princess theatre, of Dubuque, Ia., a costly and beautiful house, built by D. R. Bradley, a prominent capitalist of that city, has been turned into a moving picture house. The Princess was originally built as a vaudeville house, but Mr. Bradley decided that it would make a better paying investment by using moving pictures exclusively. H. W. Fulton is the manager. A high class service is furnished by the Standard Film Exchange of this city.

Manager Van Ronkel, of the General Film Co., 77 S. Clark street, informs me that for the week beginning Sept. 5, the books show a gain of 15 customers. Most of these show a desire for an improved service, and many of them have contracted accordingly. This is due to the extra number of prints purchased, and the better service offered by the General Film Co.

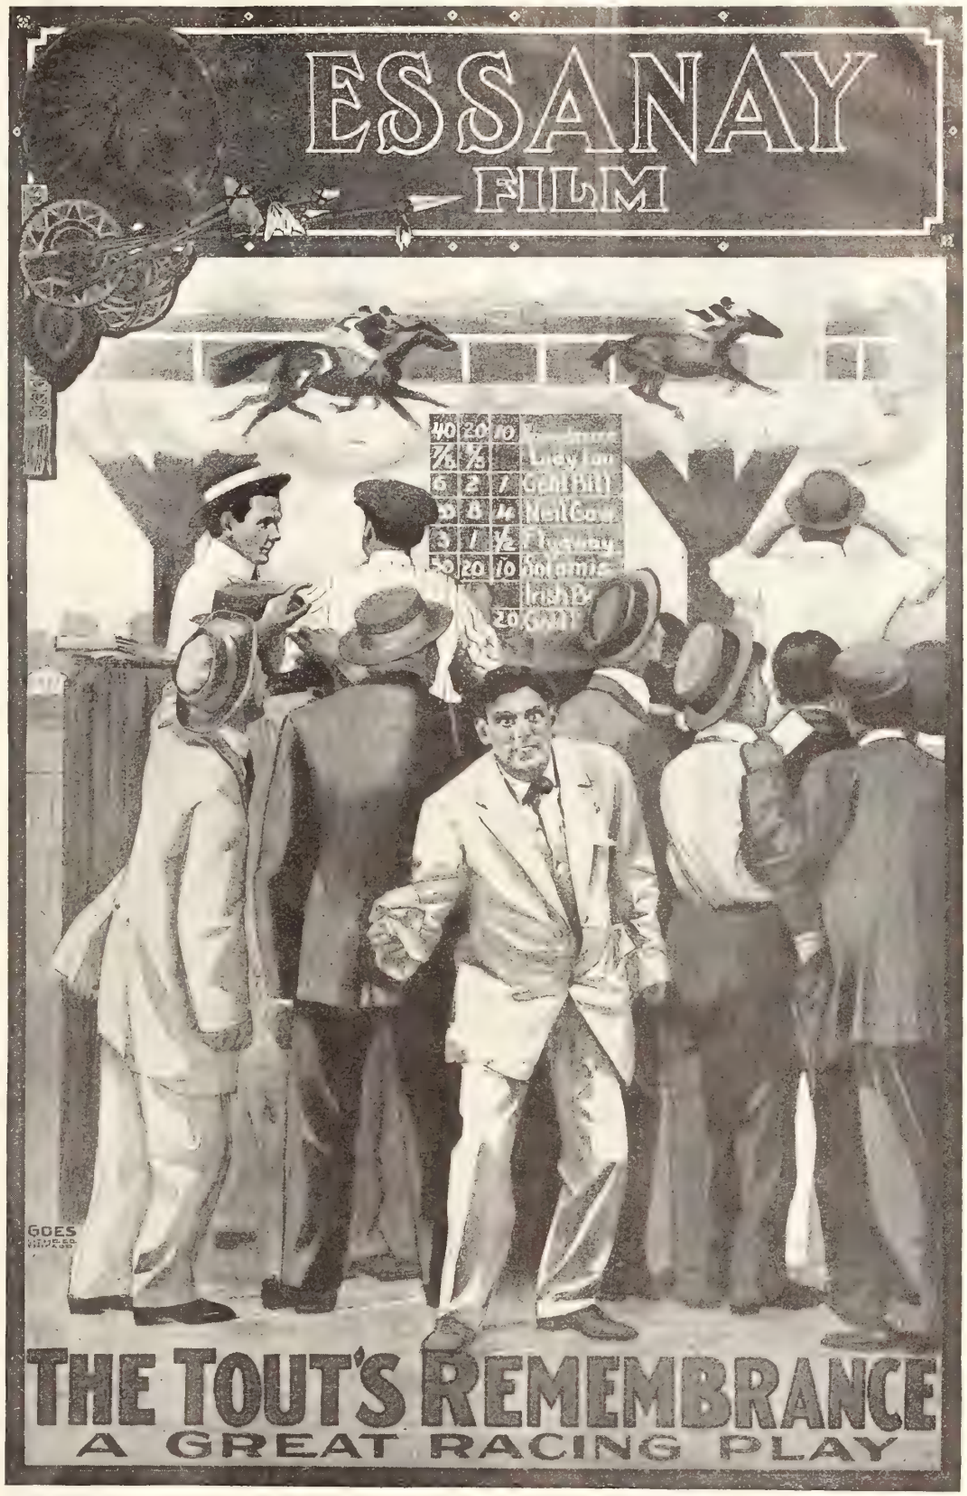
Manager V. W. Young, of the Orpheum, a new house now being built at Gary, Ind., visited Manager Van Ronkel last Tuesday and contracted for a superior service. Mr. Young also purchased a Edengraph moving picture machine, after thoroughly examining and testing the various makes. The Orpheum will be opened Sept. 22.

E. W. Lavezzi, who is making quite a stir with his improved star, cam and sprocket, states that his latest improved combination consists of an improved star wheel, an imported sprocket assembled on an intermittent shaft, and an improved hardened cam, which supports and preserves the star.

J. W. PERSONS BUYS THE ELITE THEATRE.

Sheriff Moon, of Opelika, Ala., sold the Elite motion picture theatre under attachment and execution against Doc Baker, alias H. Lequesne, on Aug. 29. J. W. Persons, one of the creditors bought the property at a nominal bid of $50.

A. E. Barr, the popular entertainer who has been in charge since the proceedings against Baker began, will continue to operate the Elite and if Opelikians will extend sufficient patronage to make the Elite pay the city will be assured of a permanent place in which to spend a few hours pleasantly at little cost for the entertainment given.



A STRONG ESSANAY POSTER

The above is a facsimile of the highly artistic Essanay poster and pictures a scene from the Essanay Company's big Western dramatic release of this week, namely, "The Tout's Remembrance."

The poster is made in four colors and many tints, one sheet size. In the upper left hand corner is shown the Indian Head, the Essanay Company's trade mark, and other symbols, suggestive of Indian life.

The scene shown above pictures one of the most exciting moments in the film when the hero, "Bullets," a race track tout, has played his last cent, a twenty-dollar gold piece given him as a remembrance by his sweetheart, and which he hopes to win back with big odds.

"The Tout's Remembrance" is a feature film, and especial pains have been taken to give the exhibitors an attractive poster.

The Essanay posters are made for the Essanay Company exclusively, and are for sale by all the licensed exchanges.

The Essanay Company's Indian Head poster placard is selling like hot cakes. Many have already been distributed and orders for more are received every day.

The Indian Head poster is a new idea in advertising. It is meant to be used in the lobby when an Essanay film is on the program. The poster is exceptionally beautiful, and will prove not only a good advertising boost, but will lend added charm to any theatre lobby.

The price of the poster is 25 cents, express collect.

Synopsis of Production Issued by the Leading Song and Novelty Slide Makers

SCOTT & VAN ALTENA.

"BRIGHT LIGHTS GAY AS THE NEW MOWN HAY."—Words by Andrew B. Sterling; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Harry Von Tilzer Publishing Co., New York. The song tells of a girl who is leading the city life and whom her friends try to persuade back home. The slides are an excellent example of Scott & Van Altena's novelty work. In thoroughly novel ways the slides reveal interesting phases of both city and country life—from Coney Island to the farm.

"WHEN FRIENDSHIP TURNS TO LOVE."—Usually in the Spring when all nature blooms into beauty. These beauties are pictured well in the illustrations for this song, which combine scenes at the seashore, country and mountains and also many interesting poses by a young couple—the victims of Spring. The words of this new march are by Edgar T. Farran; music by Justin Ring; published by Seminary Music Co., New York.

"WILL YOU FORGIVE IF I FORGET."—Words by Kurt Hirsekorn; music by G. Selig; published by Will Rossiter, Chicago. A song of the extremely sentimental order, with a very pleasing melody. The slides tell the story of the young man begging his intended to forgive a rather inconstant past. There are many in the same boat whom these illustrations will please as well as the larger majority of the audiences.

"GRIZZLY BEAR."—Words by Irving Berlin; music by George Botsford; published by Ted Snyder Co., New York. Little need be said about the popularity of this latest hit of Irving Berlin's. It is heard wherever one goes, which fact is pretty conclusive evidence that it is a success. The slides for this set are on the novelty order, just as the song itself. They tell by pictures just how they do that grizzly bear dance out West—that hugging, squeezing dance, The cowboy is there, of course, with his girl, and together they go through many antics that amuse the watcher. A sure 'nough bear figures in this set.

"NIGHT BRINGS THE STARS AND YOU."—Lyric by Arthur J. Lamb; music by S. R. Henry; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co., New York. A baritone or alto solo of exceptional merit, for which Scott & Van Altena have produced a set of slides that are remarkable for their beautiful scenery and many novelties. The posing, clever in itself, is enhanced by the beautiful surroundings that are made so wonderful by this firm's expert colorists. The novelties are the own ideas of the heads of the concern, and exhibitors may be assured that they will get their money's worth in this set, so full of these novelties.

"STOP YOUR BLUSHING, ROSIE."—Written and composed by Lewis and Bennett, co-authors of "Daddy Was a Grand Old Man," "Take Your Hands Away," "Under the Blushing Moon," etc., and Monroe H. Rosenfeld, author of "Take Back Your Gold," "With All Her Faults I Love Her Still," and many famous successes. Published by M. H. Rosenfeld, New York. The song, which deals with Cupid and a pair of youthful lovers, is exceptionally well illustrated with a variety of beautiful pictures, artistically posed and wonderfully colored. The set contains some very new and novel slides which are always to be found in Scott & Van Altena's sets.

"I WANT TO BUY A LITTLE BIT OF LOVE."—By Chas. K. Harris. This is the pathetic story of a little girl who was under the care of a stepmother. She went one day with a few pennies to a candy store to ask if she could not buy a little bit of love. The stepmother happened in the store, heard the call of the child's soul and straightway opened her heart to her, becoming thereafter almost a real mother. The slides tell the story in a very interesting manner, for the child is so cute that one could not help but bestow upon it the deepest affection.

"TAKE ME WITH YOU, CUTY, AND FORGET TO BRING ME BACK."—That listens well. Surely with such lyrics, catchy music, and illustrations posed for by such charming models, this song cannot help but become at once popular at picture theatres. It has a light, breezy air that cheers, dispelling all gloom and displeasure. Published by Leo Feist.

DE WITT C. WHEELER.

"BELOVED."—Ballad by Robert M. Stults; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co. A fine ballad by this popular writer, which will add to his assured reputation, as well as to that of the publisher. De Witt C. Wheeler needs no better reputation for excellent work, but if he did, this set alone would make him famous. The posing is dignified and of the highly artistic order. The scenery is select, and altogether the set is of the higher class upon which this firm endeavors to place the slide business in general.

"THERE'S A GIRL UP IN THE MOON."—By Jerome & Schwartz; published by J. H. Remick & Co. The cleverest idea in any moon song yet published, as the lyrics tell you that there is a girl in the moon or the man in the mon would not stay there. A predestined hit both in lyrics and melody. The set is a feature set, having many novelties in moon effects that have never before been attempted, but executed with the well known Wheeler skill in this particular line. Is it pretty, graceful models you like? Glance at these illustrations.

"HE GOT RIGHT UP ON THE WAGON."—Words by Harry Williams; music by Egbert Van Alstyne; published by Jerome H. Remick. A comic song by these two popular young authors, which bids fair to make a big hit. The slides are it, both in quality and humor. They depict in Wheeler's well known comic way the young man who climbed upon the water wagon because of a promise, and who while sitting there became so dizzy that he fell off with a terrible bump. A fine set.

"ON MOBILE BAY."—Words by Earle C. Jones, music by Chas. N. Daniels; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. A high class Southern love ballad, with illustrations that are "peachy." They are those good old Southern scenes among the darkies and the cotton, etc. Also many beautiful water scenes with models that are A1 on looks and fascinating of manner.

"FIFTY YEARS AGO."—(Dear Old Chums). Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L'Albert; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. The lyrics portray the love of an old couple, which has spanned a period of 50 years. The melody is by the composer of "Hiawatha," who sometimes uses the nom-de-plume of L'Albert. The slides tell the story only too well of this loving old couple so rich in steadfastness. We see them in their old age and we see them as they were in youth, 50 years ago, dressed in the picturesque garb of that period. We see also many very beautiful rural scenes that are assuredly of home interest. Beautifully posed and colored in Wheeler's excellent style.

"LOVE ME AGAIN."—Words and music by Robert A. Stults; published by F. B. Haviland, New York. A love ballad of the higher order, written in masterly style, and fully up to the standard of quality set by the house of Haviland. Illustrations of excellent photographic quality and clever posing, rich in nature study and human interest, are produced by Wheeler.

"BY THE MOSS COVERED WELL, DEAR ESTELLE."—Words by Earle C. Jones; music by L. Albert; published by J. H. Remick & Co. One of the timely love ballads, written in a reminiscent theme. Both lyrics and melody do full justice to the writers. The slides are of the truly Wheeler type that we like to see. They are of the dainty order, which appeal to the sense of beauty; posed in country style near a quaint old well, and are beautifully colored with the tone of nature.

"SUGAR MOON."—Published by J. H. Remick & Co. It is seldom in late years that a coon song becomes popular, but this one is certainly it, and looks like a hit. It is also seldom that we view a set of "darky" slides, so that when the opportunity is presented to do so, as in this set of Mr. Wheeler's, it is a novelty. The illustrations are full of characteristic southern poses of the black race. They are cleverly and amusingly carried out so as to make this set a very interesting one.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON.

"PUDDIN' FACE."—Words by Edgar Selden; music by Melville J. Gideon; published by Shapiro, New York City. A great boy song with a fine set of pictures illustrated with Simpson's usual good taste and conception of subject. Slides are extremely interesting and should make a hit with all audiences.

"LET THE ROSES TELL MY STORY."—Words by Clarice Manning; music by Olive Chapman and A. L. Stevenson; published by Shapiro, New York City. A very excellent love ballad. The slides produced by Simpson are of the usual high order, posed in beautiful surroundings and by good models. The artistic posing and coloring of these slides make them a very attractive set, pleasing to both young and old.

"MOONLIGHT MAKES ME LONESOME (FOR A GIRL LIKE YOU)."—Lyric by Jack Yellen; music by Geo. L. Cobb, composer of "A Happy Group;" published by Chas. I. Davis, Cleveland, Ohio. A beautiful ballad of the higher class. Simpson has produced a most pleasing set of illustrations with plenty of variety and novel effects.

"YOU AIN'T GOT THE GIRL TILL THE RING IS ON HER FINGER, AND EVEN THEN YOU NEVER CAN TELL."—By Al Bryan and Kendis and Paley. These clever artists are known the world over for the number of sensational hits they have produced. Simpson has illustrated the bashful youth and the worldly-wise father in bright snappy situations that are bound to create a laugh whenever shown; they are funny without being vulgar and yet artistic, as are all of Simpson's slides, and illustrate the words of the story so well that the eye follows the action of the story without trouble, and even a poor singer could not help but make good with these pictures. This catchy little number is published by Shapiro.

"UNDERNEATH THE MONKEY MOON."—Words by Jack Drislane; music by Geo. W. Meyer. This number is a typical jungle composition such as the house of Haviland knows so well how to make popular. Simpson has cleverly depicted the joys and sorrows of the dwellers in the jungle, as he did in the well remembered set of "Down in Jungletown," to which these slides are worthy successors.

"YOU ARE THE IDEAL OF MY DREAMS."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of "All That I Ask of You is Love," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "Hoo. Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night." Published by Shapiro. This is one of the ballad hits of the year. After all, heart interest is the thing, and no one can escape the touch of sentiment conveyed by this delightful song as sung by Frank Morrell at Hammerstein's Theatre. The slides Simpson has sent out for this song are beautiful. His models are well chosen and extremely good looking. The photography is excellent and the coloring beyond criticism.

"IF I MUST SAY FAREWELL, KATE, LET ME KISS YOUR LIPS GOOD-BYE."—Words by Robert F. Roden; music by J. Fred Helf; published by Helf Publishing Co. A very fine ballad in the best style of the above-named composers, who are so well known to the amusement public. The slides are very beautiful and are in the best style of Simpson.

LEVI COMPANY.

"WAY DOWN EAST."—Words by Cecil Mack, music by Joe Young and Harold Norman; published by the Gotham-Attucks Music Co. This is a story of the rural districts "Way Down East," with a wonderful melody. The slides depict in interesting fashion many Southern scenes and poses.

"BABY MINE."—Words and music by Clarice Manning; published by Shapiro. This is the song that is being featured in W. A. Brady's big Broadway production, "Baby Mine." It is a comic number with a catchy waltz melody. The slides are in Levi style, the novelties being exceptionally good. The two babies who assume the title role are little gems and should make this set of slides a very interesting one.

"WHEN THE GIRL WHO CAN'T FORGET YOU WANTS TO KNOW IF YOU'VE FORGOT."—Words by Robert F. Roden; music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills. This is one of the best songs of its kind that F. A. Mills has published in some time. The music is very pretty, as are all of the songs written by this famous composer. The models are exceptionally good looking, and the Levi Co. has turned out a good set of slides.

"SUPPOSE WE DO."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams; published by Roy E. Miller Music Co. A great spooning song with good lyrics and a very catchy melody. It is easy to play and easy to sing, and one you will like better every time you hear it. The slides are good.

"WHEN THE BLOOM IS ON THE CLOVER, MOLLY DEAR."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert

Sams; published by Roy E. Miller Music Co. A fine ballad with a good swing. The Levi Co. have done well with the slides, releasing in this number one of the best sets they have ever turned out. Scenes are very pretty and the coloring excellent.

"I'LL BUILD A FENCE AROUND YOU."—Words by Samuel M. Lewis; music by Kerry Mills; published by F. A. Mills. This is one of those simple little songs for which Mills is noted. A very catchy melody already being whistled about the city. The slides are exceptionally good and contain some great novelties. Both models are from "The Summer Widowers," now playing at the Broadway Theatre, and are exceedingly good looking, all of which go to make this the best set of slides the Levi Co. has ever turned out.

"SMILING EYES."—Words by J. Young; music by Minerva W. Fields; published by Church, Paxson Co. The title explains the story. Just a pair of smiling blue eyes. They are not the kind that hypnotize or mesmerize, but the kind that simply tantalize. Fine lyrics with a great melody. The slides are just as good and help to make this song a big winner.

"ROSY CHEEKS."—Words by Dave Oppeheim; music by Joe Cooper; published by Harry Cooper, of the Empire City Quartette. This is a real novelty song, one that will make any audience sit up and take notice. The Levi Co. have discovered a most beautiful girl, now playing in "Up and Down Broadway," who fits the title to perfection, and is sure to carry this song to a tremendous popularity.

COLISEUM BUILDING SOON TO BE READY.

During the last week, rapid strides haxe been made upon the new Coliseum building, at Joliet, Ill., and there is now every indication that it will be ready for the public by September 30, the time originally set by the contractors for the turning over of the completed building to the owners.

There were several changes in the plans of the building that caused some delay, but the work is now going on rapidly and the delay will not be as great as was first supposed.

The stage of the Coliseum will be too small for theatrical performances and it is thought that the owners will have to rent it for vaudeville and motion picture purposes.

DEMPSEY IN ST. PAUL.

Chas. P. Dempsey, who has been connected with Harry Davis and John P. Harris for the past four years, managing theatres for them in Pittsburg, Buffalo, Newcastle, Pa., and McKeesport, Pa., has severed his connection with that firm and gone to St. Paul, Minn., to direct the Princess theatre, one of the classiest vaudeville theatres in the middle west. Mr. Dempsey has just recovered from an operation for appendicitis and his reasons for making the change were chiefly for the benefit of his health.

BIG OPENING FOR CHAMPAIGN'S NEW HOUSE.

Jackson & Mathews opened their new motion picture show on North Neil street, between Church and High streets, Champaign, Ill., September 1, and the opening night was far beyond their expectations of what it would be, there being such excellent patronage that it was necessary to give three shows that all the patrons might be accommodated.

The room was remodeled specially for this line of amusement and has been brought out in a most attractive manner. The little theatre is provided with regulation opera chairs, the floor is pitched that a perfect view of the screen is had from every part of the house. The machine which the firm has purchased is of the very latest pattern and it is the opinion of those who were patrons last night that the pictures are as good as were ever shown in Champaign. The managers have a determination to run a first-class place in every respect, and with this determination it should succeed in taking its place among the amusers of the Champaign public, which it no doubt will do.

WILL RUN ANOTHER PICTURE THEATRE.

Manager Pichier, of the Lyric Theatre, on South Main street, Gloversville, N. Y., has leased the Star Theatre, Northville, and is now making preparations to convert that well-known house into a first-class picture theatre. Besides the remodeling, there will be installed a fireproof picture booth and a new machine. Joseph Seidel has been engaged as manager, and owing to his long experience in the motion picture line, the house should prove a paying one. The program will consist of three reels of the latest films and the latest illustrated songs.

C. S. SULLIVAN BUYS BIJOU THEATRE.

C. S. Sullivan, manager of the Royal theatre, Calumet, Mich., has purchased the Bijou theater at Ishpeming and will transform it into one of the most beautifully and best equipped motion picture show houses in northern Michigan. The theatre will be opened by Mr. Sullivan very shortly.

CASUAL COMMENT

THE cause of lighted auditoriums for picture theatres has received a big boost by an article in the Pictorial Review for October, written by Anna Steese Richardson after a personal investigation of the conditions as they now exist. Miss Richardson has gathered together a number of incidents of crime committed under the cover of the dark theatre. While these incidents do not illustrate general conditions, yet they serve to show what has happened and may continue to happen in dark houses.

No respectable manager of a picture theatre wants it said that young girls have been misled and debauched in his house, but, every theatre manager who persists in keeping his auditorium dark is in daily danger of having just such crimes as those mentioned in the Pictorial Review charged up to his negligence. Are you one of the negligent managers?

WE make use of the term "negligent" with full knowledge of its meaning. Experiments with light have proved that it can be introduced in sufficient quantities to render every person in the audience easily discernable from any part of the house without interfering with the brilliancy of the pictures on the screen.

Further than that, it has been demonstrated that these conditions may be obtained at a cost so trifling that it is not to be considered as an objection to the light house. Consequently, the continuance of a dark auditorium in a picture theatre is to be accounted for only upon the ground that the proprietor is careless and negligent. Persons that are careless and negligent should not be permitted to continue as purveyors of public amusements.

SEVERE as is the arraignment of the picture theatre by the article in the Pictorial Review it is fully merited by a large number of managers in the larger cities. Ignorant and indifferent management has been responsible for much of the trouble that has been visited upon picture theatres. Men with no previous knowledge of the business of serving the public in the capacity of theatre managers have embarked in the exhibition business. The result is that the public has not been properly safeguarded from the numerous dangers that surround places of amusement where crowds congregate.

Restriction after restriction has been imposed upon the picture theatre by municipal authorities in the effort to compel managers to provide proper protection for their patrons. No one knows better than the theatre manager what are the dangers that exist, yet it seems that managers must be compelled by law to do what common sense and decency should tell them ought to be done of their initiative.

This matter of light auditoriums for picture theatres is bound to come. Whether the owners and managers of theatres will make the change of their own volition or be forced to do so by a policeman's club remains to be seen.

A CORRESPONDENT calls our attention to the fact that many theatres in Iowa are run with lights and that minors are not allowed to enter unattended. The Index believes that there is a larger percentage of "light houses" in the smaller cities than in the large cities in which Miss Richardson conducted her investigations. There is a better class of managers in the smaller cities than in New York, Philidelphia, Chicago, etc. The mistake the writer of the Pictorial Review article made was to assume that the business was conducted upon the same plane throughout the country as it is in the large cities she visited; nor do we believe that she gave proper recognition to the many city theatre managers that are conducting properly lighted houses. But when one is "muck-raking" one must rake in the muckiest places to get the right quality of muck. As "muck-raking" has served a good purpose in other fields it will probably have a good effect in that of motion pictures. We feel certain that any conscientious picture theatre manager who has failed to see the necessity of lighting his house, will, if he chances to read Anna Steese Richardson's story, take an entirely different view of his responsibilities.

In conclusion: it lies with the theatre managers whether the picture theatre is to be a menace.

"VARIETY" MISINFORMED

"Variety," the leading vaudeville weekly, published a wild yarn regarding the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company in a recent issue, in which the statement was made that Mr. Spoor and Mr. Anderson had parted company. It is suspected that the story was inspired by a discharged employee of the Essanay company, who has been in New York looking for another job. As announced in last week's issue of The Film Index, Mr. Anderson and the Essanay stock company were on their way west on a picture-taking expedition.

While "Variety" is a good vaudeville paper—the best ever—it has always managed to get the wrong dope on the picture business. We do not recall that it has ever printed the correct version of any story. Bad showing for a paper that is so good in other things.

CROWDED OUT

On account of an unexpected and late demand for advertising space in The Film Index this week, a number of interesting stories and reviews of pictures have been crowded out. Unfortunate, but unavoidable. The only remedy is a larger paper and that will be arranged for at an early date. In the meantime don't throw things.

An "Independent" Split Coming

Indications that All is not Harmony Among the Pirate Crew—Acme Exchange Withdraws from Sales Company—Kessel and Laemmle Working Things for Their Own Benefit

THERE are indications of a coming split in the ranks of the so-called "independent" picture makers and renters. When the "sales company" was organized Kessel and Laemmle had things framed up so that they would be able to control the "independent" output and levy a tribute upon all the other makers of pictures. Thanhauser refused to go into the plan on the original basis and compelled Laemmle and Kessel to modify their demands. When this was done all "independents" came in.

As Laemmle and Kessel managed to retain control of the sales company it was hinted at the time that they would eventually dictate the management and control the output of "independent" pictures to their own advantage. Indications now are that such a possibility is about to become a reality.

It is generally conceded that the actual necessities of the "independent" exhibitors of the country do not exceed twelve reels per week. According to the claims of the "sales company" there are 26 reels per week available. With this large excess over the demand, few of the "independent" manufacturers are making any money.

Having control of the "sales company," Laemmle and Kessel have about reached the conclusion that if any one loses money it shall not be the concerns in which they are interested. Already they supply eight of the actual number of reels needed—twelve. The division is as follows:

Bison (Kessel and Bauman), 2.
Itala and Ambrosio (Kessel and Bauman), 2.
Film d'Art (Bauman and Laemmle), 1.
Laemmle, 2.
Reliance (Kessel and Bauman), 1.
Total, 8.

To even matters up a bit it has been arranged that Laemmle shall shortly begin to release two more reels each week, which will give the combination 10 of the required 12.

Being in control of the machinery of the "sales company" it will be an easy matter for them to so manipulate shipments as to give their output preference over all others.

Some, who still believe all that Laemmle says about shedding his last drop of blood in behalf of the "independent" cause, will say that such manipulation is not possible and would not happen if it were possible.

Nevertheless, it is possible and has already happened, though in a slightly different way. This is what has actually happened:

Out in 'Frisco there were two exchanges buying from the "sales company": Miles Brothers and the Acme. Only recently shipments were made to each exchange. The shipment made to Miles Brothers was billed at 10 cents per foot, but through a purely (?) clerical error, the shipment to the Acme was billed at 15 cents per foot.

For obvious reasons all shipments made to "independent" exchanges are "C. O. D." and the express company gets the money or the exchange does not get the film. Miles Brothers' bill was correct and the shipment was lifted promptly.

Clapham, manager of the Acme, refused to lift his shipment, but commenced a wire-burning controversy with the "sales company" in an effort to correct the error. A whole week was consumed in the controversy, at the end of which Clapham got an apology.

By that time, however, Miles Brothers had gobbled up all his good customers and he was so mad that he withdrew from the "sales company" and came East, hotfoot, to start something.

Clapham figures out that no independent exchange has a ghost of a chance with the Laemmle-Kessel-Bauman combination, and that it is only a question of time when that pirate crew will make all the others—both manufacturers and exchanges—walk the plank.

OHIO EXHIBITORS WANT BETTER PICTURES.

The war on undesirable features of the motion picture show business, to put it on as high a plane as possible, to establish closer business relations between exhibitor, 60 motion picture show men organized the Exhibitors' League of Ohio, Sept. 13, at the Southern Hotel, Columbus. If 1300 exhibitors in Ohio can be organized the plan is to associate exhibitors of the country at large. The members say there is no thought of forming a trust.

"More and more the motion picture show is coming to be patronized by the best people of the country," said M. A. Neff of Cincinnati, newly-elected president. "The picture show business is yet in its infancy. Its possibilities in many lines of human endeavor are yet faintly realized. Proper pictures have a tremendous educational possibility."

Another meeting is to be held Oct. 3, probably in Columbus, to complete the organization. President M. A. Neff will issue the call. F. A. Busche of Steubenville was elected temporary secretary and W. O. Yard of Wellston, temporary treasurer. The following advisory board was elected: William Sutton of Xenia, E. W. Minck of Nelsonville, William Gillett of Portsmouth, W. A. Pittis of Conneaut, J. C. Kaster of Coshocton.

LONG BRANCH HOUSE NEARLY READY.

W. H. Parker, of Long Branch, N. J., is installing opera chairs of the latest pattern in his new building in Broadway. The main entrance to the large auditorium is being finished with a metal ceiling and sidewalls. The spacious stage is almost completed and ready for drop curtains. The motion picture house containing the apparatus and films is suspended overhead near the rear of the theatre. It is fireproof in every particular, and large enough to permit the operator to move about his machine without the least inconvenience.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE AT MILVILLE, N. J.

In order that Milville, N. J., may keep up the theatrical pace that her sister cities Bridgeton and Vineland are setting, there is soon to be erected a first-class theatre in that south Jersey town. While the house will be large enough to accommodate first-class attractions, it is the intention of running motion pictures and vaudeville at least three nights a week. There are several schools and colleges in the vicinity of Milville, and Mr. Somers and his sons, who have in the past provided the people of Milville with theatrical entertainment, are planning to have the new house completed by the beginning of next season. The property on which the theatre will be built is right in the heart of the city and within easy access.

FILMS REPLEVINED FROM STEINER

Independent Exchange Man Compelled to Give Up About 400 Reels of Licensed Pictures

PROCESS of law is tedious and discouraging at times, but eventually one gets what's coming to them. Bill Steiner probably is beginning to realize that fact and is not so happy as he was some time back when he escaped on a technicality from the bankruptcy proceedings instituted to compel him to pay his obligations to the film manufacturers to whom he owed, and still owes, considerable money.

Failing to compel Steiner to pay his debts, it was decided to make an attempt to recover the numerous reels of pictures he had leased from the licensed manufacturers. The process has been slow, but it finally produced results, when, on September 13, a matter of 400 reels of licensed film was replevined from Steiner.

The proceedings were in the hands of Attorney Leroy D. Ball, of the firm of Waldo & Ball, and the reels were seized from Steiner's stock at 110 Fourth Avenue, New York, and from the Georgia Film Exchange at Atlanta, Ga. Mr. Ball went to Atlanta and took charge of the proceedings in that city, recovering 200 reels from the stock being used by that exchange, which is under the management of George Wright, but is owned by Steiner. In New York something over 200 reels were recovered.

Whether this number covers all the licensed reels in Steiner's possession is not known yet, but it is believed that but few remain.

This action on the part of the Motion Picture Patents Company would indicate that it was the purpose of that company to recover all film from exchanges whose licenses have been cancelled. If this course is pursued, there are a number of "independent" exchanges that will not have as many good pictures to continue business with, as has been the case in the past.

If some means can be discovered that will compel "independent" exchanges, still owing the licensed manufacturers large sums of money for film, to pay their debts, it may make some difference in the number of independent exchanges now listed. The majority of those whose licenses were cancelled during the past year still owe large sums of money to the manufacturers. Most of them have been doing business on the money they owe.

SCENE FROM KALEM SUBJECT, "THE STRONGER TIE"

"The Stronger Tie" is an interesting tale of the lover who disappeared and the girl who married another in his absence. The old lover came back and almost persuaded the girl to leave her husband, when her child comes to the rescue and the woman realizes that there is a tie stronger than her love for the man.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copywright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 4—The battery is only suitable for small and intermittent work. Where large current supply is required it becomes necessary to make the electricity by a dynamo electric machine driven by an engine or similar power.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 5

Three Wire System of Electrical Distribution for Direct Current.

Our last discussion closed with a description of the 2-wire direct current distributing system which is used, as a general rule, in small plants and in isolated plants where the distance from the electric generator to the point where the current is used is not very great. In a building, for instance, the distance would never be over a few hundred ft. and in a small town the distance from the power station to the furthest consumer might not be over one mile. In such places the 2-wire system may be installed and used, although the cost for copper wire is great as compared with the 3-wire system, which is generally used where large amount of power is required and where the distance may be several miles as is the case in the larger towns and cities.

The 2-wire system may be either 110 or 220 volts, but only one of these voltages can be obtained from any one system and it is a well known fact that for electric lighting, 110 volts is more suitable than 220 volts, but where there are a large number of motors and where the distance is great the 2-wire 220 volt system may have to be installed in order to cut down the expense of copper wire between the power house and the place where the current is used.

In order to make a more economical and flexible installation, the 3-wire system is installed, which enables the electric company to transmit the power for motors and lighting on the same wires at half the expense for copper, and at the same time, to give you 110 as well as 220 volt current.

The accompanying diagram figure (4) illustrates in simplified form, the 3-wire system. There are 2 dynamos or electric generators A and B, which are connected in series and both are driven from the same source of power and each one may be made to generate 110 volts.

You will observe that there are 3 line wires with this system and that while each generator gives only 110 volts by being connected in series it is possible to also get 220 volts from the same system.

Considering generator A, you observe the current leaves the positive terminal indicated by (+) traveling on the left-hand outside wire to the lamp or motor through the same and back over the middle wire to the negative terminal of the generator, thus completing the circuit and lighting the lamp or operating the motor.

The same performance takes place on generator B, the current leaving the positive terminal, but in this case, going out over the middle wire through the lamp and returns over the outside right-hand wire to the negative terminal of the generator.

It is evident that if we want to maintain the load on each dynamo, the same, it becomes necessary to balance the load so that there will be just as many amperes taken off one side as the other on this 3-wire system.

In practice this is rather difficult to do in some instances, especially where large arc lamps or motors are used, unless said arc lamps and motors are made for 220 volts so as to operate on the 2 outside wires and it is the tendency of the electric lighting companies to make you connect all motors one horse-power and larger, and all arc lamps taking more than 10 amperes on the 2 outside or 220 volt wires of the 3-wire system, which would otherwise be unbalanced, which would throw more load on one generator than on the other which should be obviated, because it inclines to lower the voltage on the side of the 3-wire system, which has to carry the greatest load. This drop in voltage on one side of the system is especially noticed with motion picture arc lamps, because these require from 25 to 30 amperes, and draw more than this amount of current from the wire at the instant the carbons are put together in order to strike the arc and you may have noticed that when the M. P. lamp is started there is a considerable drop in the candle-power of the incandescent lamps connected to the same side of the system, whereas the lamps on the other side will increase in candle-power due to the voltage going down on one side and up on the other.

This drop in voltage on one side of the unbalance 3-wire system is due to slipping of the belt on the generator, which supplies the loaded side and also due to the drop in voltage in the wires supplying that side of the system.

It is obvious that if the M. P. lamp or motor is connected to the outside or 220 volt wires there is no such disturbance or unbalancing of the 3-wire system and that is the main reason for the electric lighting company insisting upon having all motion picture arc lamps connected to the 220 volt wires as they may receive complaints from your neighbors who are fed from the same wires and whose lamps go up and down in candle-power every time the M. P. lamp is switched off or on.

You understand, of course, that if the load is very light, consisting of only a few incandescent lamps, fan motors or small 5-ampere enclosed arc lamps, this unbalancing does not make so much difference but with large motors and especially with M. P. arc lamps, the disturbance on a 3-wire system if operated on one side or on 110 volts is very great and undesirable. By observing the diagram, you will see by the arrows in which direction the current flows and it is evident that when there are exactly the same number of amperes used on either side of the 3-wire system the current goes entirely from the outside left to the outside right hand wire, there being no current flowing over the middle or as it is called "Neutral" wire.

If, however, there is required 10 amperes on one side and only 5 amperes on the other side of the 3-wire system, there will be 5 amperes flowing from outside to outside wire and 5 amperes more will flow on one outside and on the neutral wire.

The early electrical systems were all of the direct current type and so, many motors, arc lamps and machines are in service that the electric lighting companies have to continue supplying with direct current, especially in the manufacturing and business sections of the larger cities, where the distance is not great; but the tendency is to change, as far as possible, to the alternating current system of distribution, which is more economical where long distance is considered. Therefore, in the outskirts of the larger towns and cities, it is not unusual to find only alternating current, whereas in the center of the city the system is direct current.

The more modern plants are all of the alternating type even in the smallest town, but either system has advantages of its own.

The direct current system is, as a general rule, low voltage, both outside and inside of the building and is therefore practically harmless, and for certain classes of work such as small motors and arc lamps, the direct current has the advantage over the alternating in some respects.

Summary.

The 3-wire direct current system is generally supplied by two separate generators connected in series.

The current is distributed over three wires, the middle one of which is called the "Neutral."

It is essential that on a 3-wire system, the load in amperes on either side be kept the same, or as nearly so as possible.

If a 3-wire system has to supply a greater number of amperes on one side than on the other, it is likely that the side with the greatest load will supply a lower voltage than the other side.

Correction in Electrical Talk No. 3.
Issue Sept. 17, 1910, page 11.

In paragraphs No. 6 and No. 7, it was stated that the ⅛ H. P. motor required 1,250 w. or 1¼ K. W. which at the 10c. rate would represent an expense for current of $1.25. This should have read 12½c. as should also be the case in connection with the other two references where $1.25 is stated, it should have been $.125 or 12½c.—J. H. H.

COLISEUM AT NEW CASTLE BEING REMODELED.

Messrs. Harmon & Argenbright, of Indianapolis, Ind., who recently leased the Coliseum on North Main street, New Castle, Ind., are giving the old land mark a thorough overhauling, and by the end of the month, they expect to have the house complete for use. The house has been leased for a term of five years.

It is the intention of the managers to run only the best of motion pictures and vaudeville, and there will be no city in the state that will have "anything" on the people of New Castle when it comes to the entertainment line.

Among the many improvements that are being made, will be new galleries, which will have the proper slant, so that every person can get a full view of the stage. An orchestra is also being constructed. The walls will be plastered and decorated and a new ceiling put in.

In making these repairs the managers are seeing that everything will be right up to the requirements of the state regulations. Every safeguard, against fire, will be installed. New fire escapes will be put up on all sides of the building. The resident manager will be W. W. McEwen of Cincinnati. The cost of improvements will be about $6,000.

MR. ZORN VISITS NEW YORK.

George Zorn, one of the managers of the Broadway Amusement Co., of Philadelphia, was a visitor to The Film Index last Monday. Mr. Zorn, after looking over several of New York's best picture theatres, tells us that they do not compare with those of the Quaker City. In all the houses he has visited in New York, he finds that many of the managers don't care as to how old the films are, neither do they pay as much attention to the ventilating system as they do in Philadelphia.

The Broadway Amusement Company's house is under the management of Messrs. George Spaulding and George Zorn. The house seats 400 persons and is equipped with one of the latest model of Powers machines.

Since vaudeville has been eliminated Mr. Zorn says that business has increased fifty per cent. and every night finds the house filled from pit to dome.

WILMINGTON, N. C., TO HAVE MORE PICTURES.

The MacRea building on Main street, Wilmington, N. C., which was recently purchased by J. M. Solky, will soon be remodeled into a modern office building. On the ground floor there will be a first class motion picture theatre, seating nearly 500 persons.

This theatre will be one of the modernly equipped houses of the south. It will have one of the latest picture machines and a modern ventilating plant; all the pictures will be from the latest films. The house will be ready by the first of the new year.

THEATRE WILL MOVE TO BETTER QUARTERS.

The proprietors of the Royal theatre in South Range, Houghton, Mich., are preparing to move their popular little playhouse into the Kaleva temple the early part of next week. Electricians have been engaged this week wiring the portion of the new building to be occupied by the theatre and they will probably get finished by the last of this week.

Two hundred new seats have been ordered and will be installed for the opening night. Besides this, a new machine is coming and an operator who has been working in one of the theatres in Chicago. In the new quarters a greater number of people may be accommodated and the pictures can be shown with far better results.

A WANT SATISFIED.

People as a rule are creatures of habit, and once they are accustomed to a certain thing, it is not easy to turn them even to a meritorious article of similar design. When, however, it is persistently brought to their attention that the innovation really is of greater merit than what they have sworn by, they are generally frank and willing to concede the point and to make practical use of the advantages offered. This is particularly true in the case of the Motiograph, for it has taken effort to show how much in advance of the times it really was and is.

Its three years of actual test, however, have brought such floods of written approval and appreciation as to leave no doubt of the fact that this machine is supplying a long felt need.

A JOLLY EDISON COMEDY

From Canada—Another Canadian Drama—Hawthorne in Pictures

AMONG the forthcoming Edison subjects is a comedy that will not fail to make a decided impression upon motion picture audiences. The title is "A Wedding Trip," being the experiences of a newly married couple on their wedding journey from Montreal to Vancouver over the Canadian Pacific Railroad, concluding with a view of the big trans-Pacific liner "Empress of China" leaving her dock for Hong Kong with the newlyweds on board.

The Edison players have injected all the comedy possible into this picture; from the very beginning it is a laugh, and the laugh rapidly develops into a scream. The chief characters are a decidedly English gentleman of the tourist type and his lovely bride. Hotel, railroad and steamship employes and other tourists constitute the supers. There is the regulation send-off with plenty of rice, and the bride and groom are fairly started on their way.

To add a bit of instruction to the comedy, views of the route are shown. For the benefit of the camera man a platform was built out from the side of the last car of the train and a rather unusual effect is obtained. The principal cities along the route are visited by the bride and groom, and from one point several splendid scenes amid the Canadian Rockies are shown.

At another point in the journey the groom gets out to take a picture of his bride as she sits on the observation car. While he is fussing with the camera the train pulls out and leaves him. After a frantic effort to overtake it he gives up and walks toward the next station. A section hand with a "speeder" helps him over the last stage of the journey and there is an affectionate meeting when he joins his bride again.

There is a scene in the interior of the dining car that is excruciatingly funny, in fact, more good comedy incidents have been crowded into this subject than usually gets into a picture.

A "Heart Interest" Drama.

Under the title, "The Song That Reached His Heart," the Edison players will shortly release a comedy drama that possesses that quality known as "heart interest" to a most satisfactory degree. It is another of the Canadian pictures and the story is of a young man from the east who drifts up to the lumber regions of the Northwest. Several excellent views of a lumber camp and the men at work felling trees and taking out the logs are shown.

After a long season in the woods the hero of the story comes to town to spend his money. The first thing that catches his fancy is a phonograph, which he buys and takes to his room, and there, with a number of his companions, the records are run through to their great delight. When the others have gone he runs another record which brings to him fond recollections of the time when he was a boy and heard the same song sung by his boyhood sweetheart. He digs up her picture from among his belongings and sticks it in the pocket of his shirt.

Now for the girl; she has grown to womanhood, and, by a singular coincident, comes to the same town and engages rooms at the same hotel at which the young lumberman is staying. Noticing that the young woman has money two crooks plan to rob her. There is a piano in her room and the girl plays the old song upon it. The sound of the familiar notes entices the young man away from a game of cards and up to the door of the girl's room. Approaching steps cause him to hide behind a convenient curtain and he sees the crooks and hears their plan to rob the girl. The crooks enter the girl's room by a window and the hero is right behind then. A fight ensues in which the hero is shot, but not seriously wounded. The girl insists upon nursing him and in the final scenes they discover each other's identity.

The plot is interesting throughout and is portrayed with intelligence and feeling.

The House of Seven Gables.

The title of Nathaniel Hawthorne's well-known story serves as the title of an early Edison release which depicts an incident of that story in excellent manner. We have not the space to devote to an extended description of the picture this week; that will appear later. The subject is of high class and is approached with dignity and due attention to details. The story deals with a period when religious passion ran strong and men and women were burned at the stake for witchcraft. It is believed that many were unjustly accused of this peculiar crime to satisfy personal grudges. The story is that old Colonel Pynchon used this means to get his neighbor Maule out of the way so that he might become possessed of the property Maule would not sell to him. Maule is burned at the stake, but utters a curse against Pynchon that follows the family until a descendant of Maule marries a maid of Pynchon.

The house of seven gables still stands in Salem Town, but the curse was long since removed and it is devoted to charitable purposes.

ANOTHER HOUSE FOR READING.

The Hertwig property, located at 819-21 Penn street, Reading, Pa., occupied until recently by the furniture firm of Henninger, Schick & Hertwig, and now owned by Harry Zable, is being turned into a motion picture theatre.

The building is being remodeled, an addition is well under way and an attractive amusement resort will shortly be opened by the Motion Library Amusement Company, of which Ben H. Zerr is president and general manager.

The appointments will be handsome and all the latest devices in the motion picture business will be provided. The theatre will have a seating capacity of about 700. Mr. Zerr is confident he will be ready to open about Oct. 15. High grade pictures will be featured. Mr. Zerr proposes to have the public name the new theatre and a prize of $25 in gold will be awarded for the most acceptable suggestion sent to him by mail at his home, 148 North Eleventh street, in sealed envelope, marked "Prize Contest," before Oct. 1. This will make Reading's seventh picture theatre.

NEW HOUSE FOR RIDGEWOOD.

A new vaudeville and motion picture house is to be erected immediately by the Ridgewood Realty and Amusement Company, Ridgewood, N. Y. The site selected is in Ridgewood Heights, on the northeast corner of Covert avenue and Madison street, and the size of the plot is 75x90. The building is to be thoroughly fireproof and up-to-date, and the construction will be of brick with a seating capacity to be 850 people.

OPERATORS' UNION MAKES AGREEMENTS.

Motion picture operators' union 182 of the Theatrical Stage Employes' International, of Boston, Mass., announced September 12th, that it had concluded union agreements with 45 licensed motion picture theatres and film exchanges. The union now numbers 135.

It was decided to have a business agent and James F. Burke was elected. Headquarters were established at 724 Washington street, where there will also be a day office.

The meetings will be held there on the first and third Sunday afternoons of each month, beginning Oct. 2. J. J. Barry was chosen president, Lawrence Tempst, financial secretary; Harry Danto, secretary-treasurer, and Cecil True, vice-president.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

JUST as the finishing touches are being given to the new addition to the Selig plant, I learn that ground was broken for the erection of a new engine and boiler room and heating plant that will cost $50,000, the ground surface being about 7,200 square feet. The latest and most improved heating system will be installed, and it will include every building and department throughout the extensive grounds.

The new addition now nearing completion has a floor space of over 33,000 feet, the original estimated cost being $75,000. Owing to alterations in the plant this sum has been swelled to $100,000. Later on a full description of the new buildings will be given in these columns.

It is only natural to infer from such extensive improvements and consequent heavy expenditures that there is back of it all several surprises for the film world, which in due time will be revealed as the Selig policy is unfolded. Although not as yet permitted to have more than a peep behind the scenes, I can say that elaborate plans have been made to produce, in the near future, a list of Selig subjects, of regular reel length, that will show a marked departure from the beaten tracks followed by licensed manufacturers up to the present time. The novelty and attractiveness of these films will serve to stamp still more distinctly the type and quality of the Selig output and will make still more widely known the potency of the "diamond S."

Preparations have already been completed for the production of the first of the new subjects, but several weeks will elapse before detailed information will be announced. I can state that the first subject will involve a large expenditure and I know that a handsome outlay has already been made on it.

Finely Projected Pictures Necessary.

J. E. Pearce, manager of the Imported Film & Supply Co., of New Orleans, accompanied by Mrs. Pearce, visited friends in this city from Friday, Sept. 16, until the following Sunday evening. Mr. and Mrs. Pearce are on their customary Summer trip, having left the home city the latter part of August, and being due to return in the closing days of September. Thus far they have visited Norfolk, Va., Washington and Chicago. From this point they departed for Colorado Springs and Denver, where they will remain about four days, thence to Kansas City and St. Louis on the homeward journey.

Mr. Pearce stated that his new theatre, the Bijou Dream, in New Orleans, is doing exceptionally good business and that it is a standing advertisement of the wisdom of making heavy investments in the exhibiting business. If a house is not attractive and comfortable, it fails to draw its full complement of patrons, even if the program be worthy, Mr. Pearce has experienced. The Bijou Dream opened up a new section of the city for licensed pictures and its regular patronage is already large.

Mr. Pearce, in talking about his exchange, said that the Imported Film & Supply Co. had really no opposition in that territory. He attributed the present fine business to the excellent quality of the licensed product and to the cordial good feeling and hearty co-operation existing among the licensed exchanges in New Orleans, Birmingham and Dallas.

The "independent" exhibitors in New Orleans are doing a slim business, Mr. Pearce says, as they depend on cheap vaudeville to make up for the inferiority of the film. Picture houses that use straight pictures are making the most money and, whenever he sees the opportunity, Mr. Pearce advises his patrons to cut out cheap vaudeville.

"Finely projected pictures are a feature of the licensed picture theatres of New Orleans and adjacent territory," said Mr. Pearce emphatically. "The operators are very careful and each takes a pride in showing the very best pictures possible. I believe if greater attention were paid to fine projection that pictures would be much more popular than they are now.

"Down our way quite a number of the exhibitors have two machines and extra mechanism, and, where only one machine can be maintained, an extra mechanism is always on hand. I would advise every exhibitor who takes a delight in showing the best projected pictures to buy two machines and extra mechanisms. The added patronage, which finely projected pictures brings to a house, will soon pay for the additional machine."

A Word From Toronto.

Harry J. Cohen, manager of the Kleine Optical Co., in Toronto, spent three days in the city last week, returning Wednesday, Sept. 21. Mr. Cohen stated that all the theatres using licensed film are making money. Very little of the "independent" product is used, as, against 101 reels of licensed films per week, only 12 reels of the "independent" are put in.

Four new picture houses are under construction at present in Toronto, with seating capacities varying from 300 to 500 people and costing from $5,000 to $15,000.

Mr. Cohen is well satisfied with the volume of business done by the K. O. Co. in his vicinity, as it shows an encouraging increase and a healthy upward movement.

The Jeffries-Johnson Pictures.

Since last writing, the township board of Cicero passed an ordinance prohibiting the display of moving pictures portraying prize fights or other alleged immoral or indecent views, thus blocking the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures in Buckley's Hall in that township.

Thousands of people who missed the opportunity to view the pictures at Forest Park are now waiting for the opportunity to see them without police interference or insensate opposition. As time passes it is growing still more apparent that the discrimination made against these pictures is unjust and hypocritical.

Even an order of the Superior Court in Indiana has been violated by the local police in Anderson, Ind., recently. The following dispatch from that city bearing date of Sept. 15, will show the high-handed proceedings of the so-called officers of the law:

"To prevent the police from interfering with the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures Manager Pennings, of the Grand Opera House, got a restraining order from Judge Austin in the Superior Court tonight, but the court order was not served on three policemen, who rushed into the exhibition and seized the film. They undertook to arrest the operator and Pennings, but the court order interfered. By taking the films the police broke up the show. Tomorrow the operators will sue the police to recover the films, and Pennings will try to show Judge Austin that the police violated his order."

A Trip Through Canada.

Douglas H. Bergh, who has been making a tour of the principal cities of Canada, including Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa and Toronto, returned to the city Sept. 18, having been gone about five weeks. Mr. Bergh made the Canadian trip in the interest of George Kleine, of the Kleine Optical Co., to study the Canadian film condition and to act in the capacity of auditor for the K. O. Co.

Mr. Bergh is a capitalist and a business man of keen instinct and ability and, while not connected with the picture industry, is quite familiar with the rise and progress of the licensed product. Most of his time was spent in the K. O. Co.'s offices in Montreal and Toronto, where his expert ability as an accountant and auditor was brought into service, and revealed a very satisfactory condition of that company's affairs.

The K. O. Co.'s office in Montreal supplies exhibitors throughout the Province of Quebec, while the Toronto office attends to the wants of the trade in Ontario.

Mr. Bergh reports that the K. O. Co.'s business in Canada is excellent. In the Province of Quebec over 80 per cent. of the population is of French extraction, most of them speaking the English language; and, as the French Canadian is an ardent picture lover, with decided preferences for typical subjects, it follows that picture theatres have sprung up wherever there is a community easily accessible by rail. Moreover, Mr. Bergh found that the licensed product handled by the K. O. Co. is in great demand, the Western subjects of the Selig Co. and the Essanay Co. being prime favorites there.

Quebec Visited.

Mr. Bergh, during his two days' stay in Quebec, was struck by the fine average type of the picture theatre there, the leading houses being roomy and substantially built and possessing attractive fronts and pleasing interiors. He makes special mention of the Palais Royale, a handsome theatre which seats 700 people and which can boast of a fine orchestra and a first class film service. The finely decorated interior is lighted by the theatre's own electrical plant in the basement, the current also being used to furnish light for the picture machine.

J. E. Paradis, the owner of the Palais Royale, is a capitalist who has become deeply interested in the development of moving picture entertainment, and he informed Mr. Bergh that new theatres will be built and operated by him in Quebec and in other cities in the Province, whenever a desirable location offers. Mr. Bergh was impressed by the uniformly large audiences present when he visited the Quebec theatres, and by the high average social standing of the

THE LATEST IN SKIRTS

The Lubin Company Invents the Successor to the Famous Hobble

PHILADELPHIA and not Paris is responsible for the latest monstrosity in feminine attire and the "Hobble hoopskirt" is the product of the Lubin Manufacturing Company's costume department aided by the directors.

One of the stories that met with approval called for some distinctive style of dressing and the directors called the head of the costume department into consultation. The hobble skirt would not do since the hobble is a more or less general fashion and finally the hobble hoop skirt was evolved. The old fashioned crinoline started at the waist line but the new skirt is along the lines of the hobble until below the knees when a frame work flares the bottom of the skirt into a circle five feet in diameter.

It is no easy matter to walk in the "creation" for the dress must move forward without swinging, the effect suggesting that the wearer is mounted upon a platform concealed by the folds of the skirt, and the actress who played the part spent the greater portion of two days getting on familiar terms with the dress. The difficulty had been foreseen and the script developed so that she might double the parts of the two wearers of the dress.

The story is a rollicking little tale of a society star who wanted a dress that would attract attention. She gets advice from Paris that a dress is being sent and presently there arrives a huge box with the Paris label on. It takes several men to get it into the room and they are not fairly out in the hall when the box is open and Miss Millions starts to get into the dress.

After the attentive maid has hooked the last hook and has given the final pats of adjustment a start for the street is made when it is discovered that the dress is too wide to pass through the doorway. It is tilted through and the exit is made.

In the street the dress proves to be a sensation and with an unconscious air the proud wearer glides along but there is sometimes too much of a good thing and by the time home is reached again there are half a dozen men trying to attract her attention with a persistence that is not to be denied. With tears of mortification she hurries into the house and a little later the hated garment is hurled through the window where it is discovered by a happy person of color who hurries off to the home of his inamorata.

Mandy is delighted with the dress and presently we see her starting out with a veil added to the costume. Some of the men see her passing and fall in behind while others are added to her train including a lame man who limps from his wheeled chair when it is deserted by the attendant.

Mandy's stroll ends beside the river where she has planned a surprise for her ardent swains. They are all gathered on the string piece of the pier when she raises her veil. One look at the grinning face of ebony is enough and there are a dozen splashes as a dozen swains strike the water.

The story is titled Woman's Vanity and is a half reel subject to be released October 6th, with The Golf Fiend, another fast moving comedy in which an inveterate player hits more than golf balls.

CRYSTAL THEATRE, NASHVILLE, RE-OPENED.

By rushing the contractors and having them work every night until 11 for the last two or three days, the management of the Crystal, Nashville, Tenn, was able to open its remodeled theatre Sept. 10, with a brand new house inside and out. The exterior has been entirely remodeled and when unveiled will be one of the finest pieces of decorative art of its kind in the city. A new machine of the latest type has been purchased which will insure perfectly clear and flickerless pictures. The seats will be new, and, in fact, everything will be in first-class shape to accommodate the many patrons who have been waiting for the theatre to reopen.

"MOLIERE RESURRECTED"

In a Noble Gaumont Film. By James S. McQuade.

MOLIERE—whose name is the greatest in the literature of France and who, in the literature of the modern drama, is the greatest after Shakespeare—has been brought to life again. The great actor-playwright who excelled in comedy and who was far ahead of his time in tragic declamation; the genius who was decried and vilified by competitors whose eyes were blinded by jealousy to his real greatness; the husband who suffered tortures in his domestic life, through the unfaithfulness of the wife whom he loved to distraction; the one-time strolling player who put rural France into spasms of laughter, and the polished comedian who contributed still greater distinction to the splendors of the most illustrious court that the world has ever known:—Moliere has been resurrected from his unknown grave and forced to play again his part on life's stage, before our very eyes, by the mystic power of the moving picture.

The Gaumont people, in this instance, have produced a picture that is certain to become historic in moving picture annals, and I am sorry that, in the film to be released by George Kleine, they saw fit to eliminate the scene between Moliere and the Italian comedian, Scaramouche, at the tavern of the Pearl. The film as it now stands is about 965 feet; and, although the tavern scene might extend the length considerably beyond the regulation limit, it appears to me that Commercialism might well have been sacrificed to Art in this case. This criticism, however, is not intended to detract from the value and interest of the film, as it at present stands—for it will hold the minds of the intelligent in delightful thrall—but the inclusion of the tavern incident would have thrown a happy side-light on the early life of the great comedian and dramatist.

In a pictured historical biography like this, it is absolutely essential that the spectator should have some familiarity with the written life of the man and of his times. Unfortunately, picture theatre goers have not yet been fully impressed with the comprehensiveness of the mission of the moving picture. The large majority attend picture exhibitions to be amused. The minority seek amusement and instruction as well. The future of the moving picture, it is already clear, will be highly educational, as well as highly entertaining, and, to the thinking man or woman, and boy or girl, of the present day, a picture such as Gaumont's "Life of Moliere" will beget a desire for a knowledge of the great French dramatist's career.

Moliere was the stage name of the dramatist, his real name being Jean Baptiste Poquelin. He was born in Paris in 1622 and died in 1673. His father, Jean Poquelin, was an upholsterer and he held the title of "valet tapissier" to Louis XIV., his duties being to attend to the furniture in the King's chamber.

In his youth, Moliere was forced for a time to learn his father's trade, but it was soon discovered that his mind was set on books and on the writing of plays. He received a liberal education and, among other intellectual pursuits, studied law. When about 21 years old, he joined a troupe of amateur comedians, among whom was Armande Bejard, whom he married later. He secured a tennis court and fitted it up as a stage for dramatic performances, naming it the Theatre Illustre.

The little company met with little success, and at one time Moliere was arrested for nonpayment of the candles used for lighting the house. After three years of uphill work, Moliere, with his company, left Paris to play the country towns, and there the adventures of the strolling players were still more trying. Horses and mules, attached to heavy, lumbering carts, transported the wardrobe and properties from point to point and, at each place visited, a tennis court was turned into a theatre.

Let us take a look at these tennis court theatres. Tapestries were hung around the stage, and entrances and exits were made by the actors forcing their way through them. This often led to ludicrous situations and sights, as the comedian, sometimes, had his hat knocked off, or the warrior or some god had his helmet turned in risible fashion. Candles stuck in tin sconces, at the sides and back of the court, furnished the light, while a flute and a small flat drum, or, sometimes, two fiddles, supplied the music. The pit, or ground floor, had no seats and one paid about 5 cents for standing room. What we now call box seats were sold for about 10 cents. The doors opened at 1 o'clock p. m. and the curtain rose at 2 o'clock.

This country experience, during which light farces were presented, gave Moliere quite a reputation as a comedian, and at the age of 36, we find him and his company back in Paris, where, through the influence of the brother of the King, he was introduced to Louis XIV. His first appearance before the latter was saved only by the introduction of one of his farces, a big country success, and he was commanded to establish his company in Paris. All the other playwrights in the city, and the two leading theatres, were bitterly jealous, and Moliere was continually maligned and rancorously opposed by them. They even tried to get the members of his company away from him, but the actors protested that they loved Moliere so much for his extraordinary genius, honorable character and charming manner, that nothing could tempt them to leave him.

Moliere married Armande Bejard in 1662, when he was 40 years old, but her unfaithfulness came near wrecking his life and mind.

Moliere and his company were always a feature of the great festival of the king, held at Versailles. Here he first produced his masterpiece, "Le Misanthrope," his other famous comedies being "Tartuffe" and "Malade Imaginaire." It was while making his first appearance as Malade, in the latter, that he was seized with a coughing fit which caused the bursting of a blood vessel in his chest. He was at once conveyed to his home nearby and died almost immediately afterwards.

Here is a short description of Moliere, as given by a contemporary: "Neither too stout nor too thin, tall rather than short; he had a noble carriage, a good leg, walked slowly, and had a very serious expression. His nose was thick, his complexion brown, his eyebrows black and strongly marked, and it was his way of moving these that gave him his comic expression on the stage."

Moliere was a great actor-manager, as well as a great dramatist, and for these reasons his plays will always hold the stage. They act better than they read, notwithstanding their charm in the latter sense, which is always the significant mark of a great, or successful, play.

In viewing the scenes in this "Life of Moliere," one cannot fail to be impressed by the cameo clearness of the photography. And the artistic sense is always at fever point as the magnificently splendid scenes of court pageantry are lived over again.

We first see Moliere at work in his father's shop, when a boy. All the employes are busy at their appointed tasks, except the youthful playwright, who snatches time to re-read one of his earliest efforts. The door opens and the Italian comedian, Scaramouche, enters in quest of a particular style of chair. Moliere tenders his play for perusal; but, just as Scaramouche begins to be interested, Poquelin, the father of Moliere, comes in unexpectedly and the play is hastily thrown out of sight. Again the boy poet places it in the comedian's hand, and some clever comedy work is done by Scaramouche, as he tries to read the manuscript without being detected by the stern upholsterer.

The next scene shows Moliere at the Louvre palace, where he meets Louis XIV. for the first time. Here we see the scorn of the courtiers for the actor-dramatist and the consideration shown for him by the King. This scene will be remembered for the delicate beauty of the interiors shown.

Next we view the stately splendor of the festival at Versailles, where hundreds of courtiers, ladies in waiting and great nobles attend on Louis XIV. The beauty of the court costumes, which set the fashion for all the royal houses in Europe at that time, and the courtly air and demeanor of every individual in the royal pageant, have been faithfully reproduced. One cannot but marvel at the excellence of the training of this vast throng, every one of whom acts his or her part as if manor-born. We must take off our hats to this Gaumont producer.

As Moliere comes into the scene, the acting of the King, the courtiers and of the great actor himself, is faultless. When the King places his arm around Moliere's shoulders and walks off with him, it is a delight to watch the faces of the surprised and jealous train followers. And when next we see Louis seated at table with Moliere, serving him with his own hands, the cup of the courtiers is full.

The scene showing the distraction of Moliere over the desertion of his wife, is a pathetic picture, and displays talented emotional acting. Then when she appears, before finally leaving him, and we watch the play of coquetry on her witching face and note her charm of manner and grace of deportment, we do not wonder at poor Moliere's abandonment to despair. The attempt of the faithful maid servant to arouse Moliere from his apathy and melancholia, is a brilliant specimen of silent acting in both roles.

The last appearance of Moliere, and his first in the role of Malade, is a fine depiction of the stage of the tennis court theatre and of the French manner of acting a part in the 17th century. Then follow his sudden illness and death.

The closing scene of the "Life of Moliere" shows a statue of the dramatist at Versailles, in bust form. By means of a dissolving scene, the bust is surrounded by a throng of notables, assembled at its dedication to the poet's memory. A beautiful girl approaches the statue and places a laurel wreath on the chiseled brow; then, as if by magic, a similar wreath is seen in the uplifted right hand of everyone present—an imposing and fitting apotheosis of the greatest literary genius of France.

TORONTO PICTURE MEN ORGANIZE

Claim They Are Unjustly Fined—Want to Know What the Law Is

The motion picture men of Toronto are organizing an association. The first regular meeting was called Monday morning, Sept. 12, in the Cosmopolitan theatre in Yonge street.

A preliminary meeting was held Sept. 11, and temporary officers nominated.

One of these is M. Spiegel of the Cosmopolitan, who was speaking to The Star recently, said:

"It is just an organization of theatre owners, to look after their own interests, and especially to try to get the law made more definite in regard to moving pictures.

"In the first place, we want to know what the law really is. Mr. Burke, of West Toronto, was fined $50 last week for exhibiting a picture which had been shown in several other theatres in the city, and had gone unchallenged.

"Quite frequently one inspector will refuse a picture which another has sanctioned. We want more consistency.

"All pictures should be censored by the morality and police departments, who should take full responsibility. In that case we could put on a picture without the fear of being fined, for we would know that it was all right."

"Are you going to take up the question of children playing in your theatres?" asked The Star.

"That matter has not been discussed at all. One principal object is to know the law thoroughly, and to have it understood plainly in order that we may comply with it."

"A DIVER'S HONOR."—A diver and his son, also of the same profession, are reading a notice in a paper which asks for divers to apply at the Admirality in order to assist in the raising of a sunken submarine. The son applies and is engaged. In the vessel are certain plans of great value, and the young diver accepts a bribe to get these papers from the submarine and hand them over to the spy, but unfortunately while concocting the plot they are overheard by a man, who carries the tale to the father. The young diver is next seen being lowered into the sea, and he is shown disappearing into the sunken submarine. He has been under the water but a short time when the father rushes up to the quay, rows out to the boat and tells to the officials the tale of his son's treachery. The old diver is lowered down after his son, resolved upon a desperate thing. He finds the son, and after a short but fierce struggle cuts the tube which supplies air to the young diver. The film is acted with great vigor and impressiveness.

"A HIGH-SPEED BIKER."—A grocer is seen having a few words with his assistant, preparatory to the latter starting off on his morning rounds. The little homily so annoys the assistant that he departs from the service of the grocer, without even giving him a minute's notice. Finding himself in this quandary, the grocer casts his eyes around for a way out, and these fall on a fellow lounging at the street corner;

he is immediately engaged to go round with the grocer's bicycle-carrier to get the orders. Off he starts, immediately coming to earth again, but not a bit dismayed, he again mounts, and, after three efforts, he dashes off on what proves to be an adventurous journey. His escapades are thrilling in the extreme, and must be seen to be appreciated. The film is one laugh from beginning to end.

"THE SUNKEN SUBMARINE OR A PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE."—A good dramatic story and very plainly told. A young sailor writes home to his grandmother, informing her that he has been appointed quartermaster of the Pluviose. Great rejoicing takes place at his promotion, but it is silenced a day after by the news that the Pluviose has been sunk and all lives lost. The family are mourning their sad loss, when a telegram is brought in saying that the grandson was at the last moment transferred to another ship.

"TOO MUCH WATER OR HOW HE MADE READY FOR THE FLOOD."—A certain gentleman wakes up one morning and makes the horrible discovery that the town is being flooded. After surveying the damage done, he hurriedly makes preparations in case his residence becomes in danger, and to do this he fits up a boat, provisions it and places it in readiness to be launched from the window. Night arrives, he prepares for rest, and washing prepartory to going to bed, he omits to turn off the tap. In his sleep he has a most horrible nightmare in which he is drowning, and in his fright he leaps out of bed only to find his room flooded. He retains his self-possession, however, and boarding the boat, gracefully launches it through the window, the only mishap being that it capsizes when reaching the water. This is a film full of humor and is weak in no part. The out-of-door scenes were made during the great Paris flood.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"THE QUARREL, OR A KIND-HEARTED NEIGHBOR."—A woman is deserted by her wealthy husband. She finds an unpretentious lodging and works with her sewing machine to keep herself and the babe. She suffers many privations in the endeavor to make both ends meet, and one day when she gives away to her grief, her sobs are overheard by a pleasant-looking old workman who lodges on the same floor. He comes to offer her sympathy, notices the evidences of poverty, and, with true tact, leaves some money in the baby's hand. In the course of his employment he does some work at a large house. A portrait there seems familiar—he has seen a copy at the house of the woman he has befriended. He finds it is her faithless husband, and deliberately breaks open the rich man's desk and takes sufficient money to supply the wife's needs. He places the notes in her drawer in an envelope bearing the husband's monogram. The police and the husband soon come to the workman's room; he calmly leads them to the next apartment. The husband, full of remorse, on seeing his wife there, dismisses the police and pleads for the forgiveness of the woman he has wronged.

"REEDHAM'S ORPHANAGE FESTIVAL 1910."—The smart orphanage children drill wonderfully well, forming up into intricate designs which make a very effective spectacle. Amongst the devices represented are: The Maltese Cross, star in circle, concentric circles, etc. A variant of the ordinary program which is sure to please.

The fancy evolutions of the boys are not only performed with a skill and finish rarely witnessed even in military circles, but they produce artistic evolutions which will arouse every audience to enthusiasm.

Formation of companies and marching to position.

Artistic evolutions: Formation of companies in a square with open corners, enclosing one company.

THE PATH OF DUTY

A splendid scenic picture of the rock bound coast and a gripping heart interest story of a young revenue officer who follows the path of duty, even when he is called upon to arrest the father of the girl he loves for smuggling. The girl untangles the snarl and arrests the real smuggler, turning him over to the officers. Perhaps you will remember some coast pictures we released last fall. If you do you will want this subject.

THE BAGGAGE SMASHER

The bogus nobleman decamps with some valuable diamonds and when the police come in search of him, he would have made a clean getaway, had it not been for the baggage smasher. The baggage man drops the trunk and the lock bursts open, disclosing the crook inside. It is a spirited comedy drama with a farcical finish that is as funny as it is unexpected.

"THE SHERIFF'S CAPTURE."—Nell does not like sheriffs. The dislike is general and not confined to any particular official, and she is rather pleased with Dick Land when he rides into the yard and asks for a drink of water until she spies his star and learns that he is looking for a couple of outlaws. The outlaws are in hiding in the house, but Nell assures the sheriff that she is all alone and he rides on in search of the fugitives. The men come from the house and one fires after the departing official, who is badly wounded in the shoulder. Nell does not like sheriffs because she has been brought to believe that they shoot men in the back instead of facing fire, and now her sympathies are all with the man who lies senseless and bleeding. The outlaws make their escape and she manages to get the sheriff into the house, improvising an ambulance from a door, the sheriff's lariat and his horse. Then she rides for a physician to dress the wound, and her indignation against the desperadoes who fight behind men's backs leads her to give information to the deputies as to their probable whereabouts. The deputies ride after the two men and the doctor and Nell return to the ranch, where the sheriff is soon made comfortable. The deputies make their capture and are highly elated, but the sheriff makes a far more important capture and Nell prepares to serve a pleasant life sentence as his wife, for it was love at sight on both sides.

"THE PATH OF DUTY."—Philip Trask is a member of the revenue service and his duties have brought him frequently to the little home of the Masons. The father is a fisherman, one of those rugged, big-hearted followers of the sea, and he is proud when Phil asks Maude's hand in marriage. He likes the alert young officer, whose energies promise early promotion, and the course of true love flows smoothly. But the sun does not always shine, and one day Mason finds a boat overturned by the waves in the storm of the night before, and beside the boat lies the senseless form of its occupant. Mason takes him home and his simple ministrations soon bring the man to consciousness. He takes his departure after warmly thanking his rescuer, but he leaves behind a note dropped from his pocket in his eagerness to assure himself that his papers have not been disturbed. The note is found by Phil, who has been warned to be on the lookout for a band of smugglers. The note is ambiguous, but it seems to leave no question as to Mason's complicity in the crime. It is a terrible situation for the young lover, but his star reminds him of his sworn duty and he makes the arrest despite Maude's tearful appeal. Mason is taken to the customs station, but meantime the smuggler returns and asks for his letter. Maude's quick wit grasps the situation and the man is confronted with a gun and forced to follow Mason's footsteps. He quickly clears Mason of all blame and in the end the old fisherman decides that, after all, a man who follows the path of duty will make a good son-in-law.

"A PLUCKY AMERICAN GIRL."—Just plain Mary Ann, that's all, but there is something about this little country girl which stamps her as the right sort, with grit, grip and gumption to distinguish her among the famous men and women of the twentieth century, or any other century for that matter.
Her father is a faithful old servant in the employ of the D. & C. R. R. as a signal man in a tower on the lonely stretch of the track at a very important junction. After his day's work Mary Ann, who has studied telegraphy and likes to practice, comes to the tower to go home with her father, after the night signal man comes to relieve him. The night man is somewhat delayed and her father leaves Mary Ann at the signal station while he goes home to get his supper and rest. He starts down the track and discovers that part of the rails have been torn up by a party of desperadoes, who design to wreck and rob the special limited. The old employee turns back on his way to the tower to report the danger and warn the trainmen. As he does so he is shot and wounded by the villains. He manages, however, to get back to the tower, where he finds the night agent on duty and Mary Ann gone home. While he is telling the night man about the torn track the outlaws burst into the room, shoot the night man and knock the old man senseless.

Mary Ann, sleepy and tired, impatiently waiting for her father's return, looks out the window for him and notices there is something wrong with the switch and signal tower; looks at the clock and realizes that the "limited" is soon due. She hurries from the house, sees the signals are not set for the "express" and quickly makes up her mind to get to the next station to notify the oncoming train. She sees a hand car standing on a siding, jumps aboard and plies the handles. Soon she is at the station, breaks the window, jumps in and sends a message along the line, reaching a station where the message is received and in which the sheriff of the county happens to be. The station agent tells him, he forms a posse at once, and they start out, signal the train, avert the wreck and arrest the outlaws, and all through the nerve and pluck of Mary Ann.

"LIFE PORTRAYALS"

A HOME MELODY

Friday, September 30th

A Drama in Which the Music of a Home Melody Restores a Mother's Reason Dethroned by Shock.

It is not unusual in the home where the taste for music prevails we will find strong evidences of love and culture.

Seated at the harp, Mrs. Leslie is playing that instrument. Mr. Leslie at the piano and their little girl sings, producing a beautiful home melody which is greatly appreciated and enjoyed by their friend and visitor, Mr. Blank.

On the edge of a placid river Stella, the little daughter, is seen making her way to a canoe which is partly drawn up on the shore. She gets in it just as her mother follows and lifts her from the boat, and they wander through the fields to a shady tree, where Mrs. Leslie seats herself with her arms lovingly about Stella's shoulders and gradually falls asleep.

While the mother is sleeping the child goes back to the river and the canoe. Her father comes along, and the child, leaving her Teddy-bear in the boat and dropping her hat, runs to him. He carries her across fields, where they find the mother sleeping and go on in their romp and fun.

The mother awakes, misses her child, rushes to the river, discovers the canoe, which has been upturned, then she sees the child's hat and Teddy-bear. Her mind is deranged by the shock; she tries to throw herself into the stream and is prevented doing so by two men who hear her screams of anguish and come to learn the cause. She wanders along the river bank and disappears.

The husband learns of her derangement and immediately notifies the police, who institute a search, but finds it fruitless. The poor woman goes aimlessly about until she is found by the friend (whom we saw in the first scene) playing the harp of a street musician, instinctively feeling for the melody of home.

The friend takes her to her family. She does not recognize them until she comes in contact with her harp, upon which she begins to play the home melody; the friend has the husband play the piano and the child sing. Gradually reason is brought back on the tender strains of the home melody and with it happiness and unity.

HER ADOPTED PARENTS

Tuesday, September 27th.

A Story of the Cherished Love and Memory of a Daughter for Her Parents Which Led Her to Adopt an Old Couple and Make Their Lives and Her Own Happy and Blessed.

Her grief is intense, accountable perhaps by the years of companionship with her parents, whom she mourns, and probably by the fact that she has remained a spinster to prevent possible separation from those she loved. Regularly at each meal served in her home the woman has two seats for the loved ones as if they were in the same places they occupied at the table when living. This she seems to do religiously as a sort of memorial.

The depression of loneliness becomes so great she buys a small house in the country where she can spend her summers. The house is occupied by an old couple who are so reduced in circumstances they are dispossessed and obliged to go to the poor house. The maiden lady, who has now moved into the place, learns about the old couple from a neighbor. She goes to the poor house to see them. She is deeply and favorably impressed with the old people, and in memory to her parents and a desire for companionship she asks the couple to become her adopted parents and make their home with her. The old gentleman is willing that his wife should go with her, but with becoming independence prefers to stay at the public institution.

The old lady goes home with her foster daughter, but cannot bear to be separated from her husband. She sneaks out of the house at night and returns to the poor house and her life partner. She left a note telling her good friend that she has gone to join her husband.

The good woman discovers the absence of her adopted parent, finds the note, upbraids herself for separating the old folks, and immediately goes to them and tells them she wants them both to live with her. She persuades them to accept her as their daughter, and they are all back in the old couples' home of many happy years to remain in still greater happiness for daughter whose love and respect for her own parents made her love and respect others.

THE BACHELOR and THE BABY

Saturday, October 1st

A Society Drama Full of Complications of a Very Natural but Very Strange Character, in Which a Baby Left in a Bachelor's Apartment Leads to a Separation from His Sweetheart and a Marriage Years Afterward to the Baby's Mother.

THE BACHELOR AND THE BABY

Secretly married, Letty Holcomb is now the mother of a sweet little baby boy—she is impatient that Hugh Channing, her husband, announce their marriage and give the child its legal name. Hugh, who is presumably a bachelor among his friends, refuses to publish their wedding, and while he is living in swell apartments Letty is living in a couple of poorly furnished rooms trying to protect herself and baby from calumny and shame. Her husband not only refuses to make their wedding public, but he entirely denies it, sending her a statement that it was a mock ceremony.

Crushed and stunned, she feels helpless. Recovering from the blow, she decides to strike back, goes to the apartment house where her husband lives, she locates his rooms, which are next to a suite occupied by a young bachelor named Benson, who is engaged to be married to a very pretentious young lady of aristocratic importance.

The young wife returns to her home, takes her baby and carries it to Hugh's apartments with a note telling him she is going away and leaves his child for him to support and care for.

In her excitement and anxiety she mistakes young Benson's apartment for her husband's, and leaves the baby on the bachelor's bed and makes her escape from the building without being observed.

The young and aristocratic finance of young Benson sends him word that she is coming with her mother to visit his rooms and learn some of the mysteries of a bachelor's life. They arrive and are charmed with his home, but are very much startled and shocked when they discover the baby in his rooms. Benson is as much mystified as they are, and, rushing into his bedroom, they find Letty's baby and the note. The mystery deepens; the ladies are horrified and the engagement of Benson and the young lady is discontinued and she refuses to have anything more to do with him.

Disappointed and lonely, Benson sympathizes with the poor kid, and resolves to adopt it as his own and forever remain a bachelor. Hugh Channing is taken fatally sick, sends for Benson, and before he dies gives him a confession that he had lied when he told Letty that her marriage to him was a sham and he had grievously wronged her.

The child grows to be a bright and handsome boy, and Benson finds him a very companionable chum, and they pass most of their spare time together. One summer at the seashore the boy tears his trousers. Benson takes him to a young seamstress, who lives there, to have her repair the boy's clothes. While she is measuring the boy's waist she sees a ring on his finger and recognizes it as the one she had tied around her baby's neck when she left it in Benson's room. She asks Benson about it—he tells the woman his knowledge of the child and she learns that the boy is her own child. Benson shows Letty her husband's confession, and while she is happy at finding her child he hates to be separated from him, but the situation is easily relieved when they find that they are both in love with each other in their mutual love for the boy, and decide they can better care for him by becoming husband and wife.

PATHE FRERES.

"MAX IS ABSENT-MINDED."—This represents Max as a charming fellow, with an unfortunate habit of becoming absorbed in a single train of thought which leads him to commit such hopeless blunders as pouring coffee into his hat, deserting fair companions in the street for the sake of a match and borrowing "lights" without returning the cigarettes to their rightful owners. He is negotiating with a horse dealer for the purchase of a mare. He finds the animal unsuitable, and writes a short note to the dealer to the effect that he is not inclined to buy. He has barely signed the letter when he receives another from his future father-in-law, with an invitation to dine and to fix the date of the wedding with his daughter that evening. Max replies, but in his usual distraught way he slips his notes into the wrong envelopes, so that the old gentleman receives the following: "It is useless your reckoning upon me. I do not want her for several reasons; first, because she is too old; second, she is knock-kneed, and lastly, she bites. * * *" It is not to be surprised that the engagement is cancelled.

"COLOMBO AND ITS ENVIRONS."—A highly colored scenic picture showing the most interesting views of the famous capital of Ceylon.

"WHO OWNS THE RUG?"—Who owns the rug? It is indeed a conundrum; for the more often you see this picture, the more uncertain you will be as to who is really the rightful owner. Firstly you will probably favor Mrs. Smith, who first purchased it from Ikestein and laid it on her doorstep as a mat. But what is Mrs. Jones' position when tricky Ikestein furtively picked up the rug and took it next door and sold it to her. Did not she, as an innocent purchaser, have a right to believe that the rug was hers? It was hers, too, for a few minutes, for she, also thinking it would make a good doormat, spread it on the top of her stoop. Unfortunately for her, Ikestein was awaiting his opportunity, and as soon as she had disappeared indoors, he rolled it up and went next door and sold it to Mrs. Robinson, who likewise used it as a doormat. Mrs. Robinson purchased the rug, not knowing that Mrs. Smith and Mrs, Jones had already purchased the same rug. Is she to be blamed and lose out, or, as the final possessor, is she to be considered the rightful owner? But, if Mrs. Robinson was the last purchaser of it, how can she be considered to have a better right to its ownership than Mrs. Smith, who was the first purchaser, and where does Mrs. Jones come in? We leave it to you to see on the screen the comic situations that arise when Mesdames Smith, Jones and Robinson each in turn miss the rug and find it on their neighbor's stoop. Lucky it was that Messrs. Smith, Jones and Robinson returned from work in time to help settle the dispute, but if it had not been for the trolley car it is doubtful whether the ownership would yet have been settled. No prize is offered for guessing how the trolley car settled the matter. You must see the film; and if you do not hurt your sides with laughter await the finish.

"SOUTHERN TUNIS."—Tall date trees against the background of the silent desert forming a beautiful oasis is the first of the many things of Southern Tunis revealed in this film. Under the protecting shade of these giant trees grows a verdant mass of clinging vine and smaller fruit trees. Then comes a picture of a dangerous inhabitant of the country, a cobra, which rears its hooded head menacingly. But paramount in interest are the pictures of the clouds of locusts settling upon the land and ravaging its crops, a blight which human ingenuity is yet powerless to combat. Bringing hunger, as they do in their train, it is strange that the locusts should sometimes serve as food when other nourishment is not obtainable, but this is so, and a boy picking off and eating the locusts settling on his coat illustrates this truth. Market scenes at Nabeul, a picture of a noria—a rude contrivance sometimes used in Spain and Eastern countries for raising water—and views of flocks pasturing amongst the olive trees under the sheltering care of a Tunisian shepherd, are also included in the film.

"THE SICK BABY."—The wife of a drunkard, whose child is lying sick, is receiving the visit of the doctor whilst her husband is drinking away what little money is left him. The doctor shakes his head ominously as he looks at the child and leaves behind him the prescription for an expensive medicine. The mother, whose pockets are empty, stares at it blankly after he has left, and then, with a sudden movement of fury, snatches up her shawl and runs out to find her husband, after bidding a neighbor watch by the child. In the saloon a painful scene takes place between husband and wife, but at last the latter induces the man, who is at that point where he is stupidly jovial, to accompany her home. Here she endeavors to make him realize that the child is dying for want of care, but it is a hopeless task, and, after giving vent first to a display of maudlin affection and then to a fit of ungovernable fury, the semi-brute of a drunkard falls into a heavy sleep on the floor. Impelled by some unknown force, the woman then goes out again into the street. It is snowing hard, and, overcome by fatigue and cold, she sinks down on a bench. A tipsy night reveller rouses her from her lethargy with an incoherent invitation to be up and be jolly. He follows up his invitation by brandishing a pocketbook stuffed with notes before her eyes, but she moves off, and the fellow, sinking down on the bench, lets fall the pocketbook. The woman sees it and is tempted to abstract one of the notes before taking it to the station house. Here she finds innumerable formalities have to be gone through before she can be allowed to depart, and whilst she is recounting her story the reveller appears to declare his loss. The pocketbook is opened, the notes counted, and the missing one is found in her possession. She tells her story and the reveller, a little touched, refuses to prosecute. But the end of the story is not yet, for some thirty minutes after the woman returns home, a knock is heard at the door. it is the toper, who, with his arms full of provisions and medicine, is rather a curious object. He hands his burdens to the overjoyed woman, gives the baby the first spoonful of the restorative medicine, and, with unconscious humor, winds up with a little homily to the now sobered husband on the evils of drinking.

"THE HOODOO."—Augustus Slip is one of the beneficiaries under his uncle's will and he is summoned to attend at the office of the attorney for the estate to receive his legacy. Amidst great grief he receives from the attorney a package which, on opening it up, turns out to be an ancient statue of a little Indian god. Real grief now shows itself, for Augustus had expected larger and better things. However, he determines to keep it, for his uncle was a good fellow and he puts it in his pocket, and meeting some friends, shows it to them. One of them, who apparently knows, tells him that it is a hoodoo. Augustus does not believe in such things and decides to still keep it. When, however, a waiter in a restaurant upsets a tray full of orders over him and he is knocked down by an automobile, and on his return home finds a letter from his fiancee putting an end to their engagement, he comes to the conclusion that his friends were right and decides to give the little idol away. He first tries his butler, but he soon discovers that it is a hoodoo and returns it to him. Next a faking blind man who opens his eye and seeing what it is, returns it to him. Then he places it in a small grip and leaves it in a quarry where a blast is just going to take place, and runs away, but the blast explodes and the bag and its contents are hurled so as to fall at his feet. Finally it seems to him a good plan to leave it on the sidewalk while he jumps on a car, but a thief sees it and runs away with it. A cop, however, notices the thief take it and gets back the bag and rushes off after the car with it. Almost exhausted, he gets up just as Augustus steps off. Disconcerted, Augustus runs away, but the cop and several hundred school children just coming out from school are after him and he is soon caught and the bag handed back to Augustus. He decides to go and see his late fiancee and explain matters to her. At first she will not speak to him, but after an explanation she fetches a hammer and tells him he had better smash this unlucky idol. He does so, but what is their surprise to find in it the plan of a secret diamond mine and a goodly lot of large samples from the mine. Needless to say that the hoodoo is now at an end and Augustus and his girl make it up and determine to share these riches together.

"ROSE O' SALEM-TOWN."—Reliable authority states that nine million human lives were sacrificed through the zeal of fanatical reformers during the Christian epoch. Religious fanaticism was in most cases the cause, still there were many victimized to satisfy a personal grudge, and this Biograph subject shows how easily such a crime can be perpetrated. Play upon the minds of a superstitious people and you may lead them blindly to any end. In 1692 the agitation was so great in Salem, Mass., that many people lost their self-possession, some even believing themselves to be witches. On the other hand, a number of the inhabitants moved away for fear of being accused of being witches. There are many relics of those days still in existence at Salem, and while conditions are such as to prevent our using the actual spots, yet many of the scenes of the picture are closely contiguous to them, our company of players making the trip there for the purpose. The story tells of the old mother and her child living on the sea coast, care free. The mother ekes a living telling fortunes and nursing the sick among the village folk. The girl we might term a child of the sea, as she spends most of her time among the wave-lashed rocks of the coast, scampering from jut to jut more resembling a sprite than a human. Off in the hills we find a trapper at the camp of Mohawk Indians, on his way to the sea, of which he had heard but never seen. A Mohawk brave volunteers to guide him to the great waters of the Atlantic, leaving him there overwhelmed by awe at the grandeur of the spectacle. Here he meets the pretty maiden and an attachment develops which later ripens into love, a betrothal resulting. As the girl reaches her home she is accosted by a hypocritical Puritan deacon, whose insulting advances she indignantly repulses. He in revenge goes to the other churchmen and accuses the girl and her mother of being witches. Proof sufficient to convince these narrow-minded fanatics is easy to obtain, for the fact of the old lady's care and curing the sick is known to all, hence they purposely construe her kindness to be witchcraft. The poor souls are seized and thrown into prison, and later condemned by a prejudiced jury to be burned at the stake. As they are carried to the jail they are met by the trapper sweetheart, who, learning of her pending danger, rushes off to enlist the aid of his Mohawk friends to rescue her from this awful fate. The mother is first to be made a victim, and while she is suffering the injustice inflicted upon her the deacon visits the girl's cell and shows her from the window her mother's fate, with the hope of weakening her determination. She still repulses him, and so is lead forth to be victimized as was her mother. Meanwhile, her sweetheart has gotten his Mohawk friends and is rushing to the rescue, arriving just as the torch is put to the brushwood piled up around the girl. With a mad dash the Indians rush upon the scene, knocking down and scattering the fanatics and carrying the girl off before the Puritans realize what has taken place. In fact, it was done so quickly that some of the more superstitious thought she went up in smoke.

"EXAMINATION DAY AT SCHOOL."—You can catch more flies with honey than with gall, and you rule easier by kindness than by tyranny. This fact is shown in this Biograph pastoral, which indeed might prove a lesson to educators. The teacher to thoroughly impart knowledge must win first the love of his pupil, otherwise his efforts are in vain. The old village schoolmaster is a lovable soul, and you can see the love his scholars bear him written on their smiling countenances as they scamper on to school. He in turn comes trudging along, his face lit up in the pleasant anticipation of soon being in the midst of his loved ones. All hail him joyously at his entrance, and there are the little remembrances—an apple from one, a pear from another, a bouquet from another, etc. The opening exercises begin and the odious announcement that the county examiner will be there is received with frowns and pouts. The examiner arrives outside and the old teacher goes to meet and escort him into the classroom. While he is absent Jimmy, the village "cutup," draws a caricature of the examiner on the blackboard. This so incenses this irascible personage that he immediately dismisses the class for the morning, and when they have gone discharges the poor old schoolmaster. What a blow. He goes home almost heartbroken at the thought of losing the association of his dear little flock. Jimmy later becomes truly contrite for what he did, and with the scholars at his heels runs off to the teacher's home to beg his pardon. Here they learn what woe their lark has caused—their dear old teacher discharged. In the meantime, the examiner has gone to the commissioners' office and engages a new teacher, whom he enjoins to lambaste these youngsters into submission. With what success we shall see. The scholars unanimously plan a revolt and no sooner has the new instructor turned his back than he receives a fusilade of fruit and vegetables. Well, they soon whip him and he rushes off to the commissioners' to tender his resignation. The children follow and insist upon the reinstatement of their old teacher. Their plea is granted, so they hurry off to the teacher's home and fairly carry him back to the schoolhouse. The class again in session, the old teacher gives thanks, writing on the blackboard, "Praise God fro mwhom all blessings flow," the children singing as he writes.

"THE OLE SWIMMIN' HOLE."—"How dear to our hearts are the scenes of our childhood."

The busy cobbler drops his tools to make happy the childish heart of little Nellie Leach, who was reading a paper to the old workman, that turns out in reality to be a letter from his old friend and comrade informing him of his good fortune, saying his back pension had been granted to the extent of $1,500, and could be had by calling at the writer's office at any time. The old soldier's heart was lightened, but a sad misgiving look falls from the veteran's eyes that bespoke foreboding of evil.

Receiving the money and kind expressions from his old companions, he goes to his little shop, that seems to hold more happiness for him than all the money in the world. The light that little Nellie had put into his life in her childish patter was vigor to him—she was to be his beneficiary. The treasure is placed under the cot that has served as the only bed the old soldier has enjoyed for almost a score of years.

"Windows have eyes and walls have ears" and evil lurks in every dark corner.

Pero's eyes had caught a glimpse of the treasure through the little window and he vowed to gain it. Securing same, he buries it near the creek, but not unnoticed by the boys of the "ole swimmin' hole." When the loss is discovered and weighs heavily upon the old soldier, his greatest comforter is little Nellie, whose tenderness shed rays of sunshine to lighten life's burden for him. Finally when the box is found his happines knows no bounds. Retribution and all ends in peace and contentment.

"A KENTUCKY PIONEER."—John Winslow, an early pioneer of the grand old state of Kentucky, had labored hard and long to prepare a home on the shaded hillsides near the Ohio. Martha Saunders, the girl whom he had hoped would become mistress of the cabin, was watching the daily arrival of the stage coach in the little village of Greentown, Ohio, for some word from John. Weeks and months passed by and letters and encouragement passed between them. Finally when all was in readiness Winslow writes the widow and sends a guide, saying her arrival would hasten the time when her daughter would become his wife. In a few weeks Mrs. Saunders, her daughter and the guide arrived in the old fashioned pioneer wagon and were welcomed by the Kentuckian and his neighbors in a manner befitting his future bride. Martha was the admiration of the settlement. Black Hawk, an Indian near the Winslow farm, was profuse in his entreaties for the friendship of Martha—tokens of love were offered and his squaw grew jealous, and more so when Black Hawk saved Martha's life when she was in danger of an approaching bear. This only served his purpose of carrying her off. Winslow, hardened to his country surroundings, knew no fear, and sought the Indian camp. The squaw and Martha make good their escape—the camp on discovering their absence was thrown into a furious rage and vowed vengeance.

The pitched battle between the pioneers and the raging Indians is fought with all the stubborn bravery that characterized the early settlers and the complete rout of the Indians and the recapture of Martha in the shade of spreading elms, completes a beautiful story of pioneer days.

"HANK AND LANK, OR THEY DUDE UP SOME."—Hank and Lank have experienced a little rough weather since we last saw them and the fact that they are disreputably clothed has not been overlooked by them. They need something new. But how? After some thought Hank's cheerful countenance lightens. He goes on to explain his little scheme in detail. Supposing they find an uncovered coal hole in a sidewalk and accidentally fall into it. Isn't there some law against coal holes left uncovered? Lank believes there is, but where will they find an uncovered coal hole Hank tells him to leave the matter to his own little process of deduction or invention and advises the tall fellow to just watch him.

Hank pauses in front of a swell apartment building. looks about to see that no one is in sight, then deftly lifts the lid of the coal hole at their feet and lets himself drop down into the uncertain darkness within. A moment later there is heard a howling and wailing and Lank hurries up to the janitor of the building and tells him that some one has fallen into the coal hole. The janitor is easy prey to the scheme, and hurrying down into the basement sym-pathetitcally administers to the injured man's ailments. Hank is a sight! During the interim of lonely confinement in the coal hole he has managed to smear coal dust and dirt on his clothes and face and otherwise disfigure his appearance. The janitor is frightened and asks Hank not to take the matter to law, offering a neat roll as apacifier. Hank is satisfied and pockets the money, much to the relief of the janitor.

Some time later, after Hank is diked out in his new clothes, Lank concludes that it is his turn. The same performance works successfully to a certain point, but when Lank drops down into his manhole a grimy coal heaver grabs him by the seat of his trousers, carries him out of the house and kicks him on his way. The fellow had heard the conversation, had seen the coal hole removed, and had waited for his victim.

"CURING A MASHER."—Mr. Pest is a certain type of nuisance with whom you are all more or less familiar. A silly egotist with an exaggerated notion of his own importance, he believes that every woman he meets will fall an easy victim to his charms. As our story opens Mr. Pest is seen parading a fashionable drive watching his chance to make a mash with some fair damsel.

An opportunity comes at last, but the young lady is far from won by his smirking smile and walks away with a defiant toss of her head. Mr. Pest makes another attempt but is soundly slapped for his troubles. Not daunted by this the masher approaches a third young woman and makes his annoying advances despite her threats to summon a policeman.

Finally, however, the young lady's eyes suddenly light and she turns to the masher with a smile that means acquiescence. Certainly, she will be pleased to have Mr. Pest's company. Then she goes on to explain that she has some shopping to do and would Mr. Pest be so kind as to help her home with her things.

Little knowing what this means, Mr. Pest nods his head, and with an elegant bow takes her arm. The young woman pauses in front of a hardware store and first of all purchases a dozen flat-irons and a heavy pail to carry them in. When she goes into her purse, however, the masher waves her aside and pays the littel bill himself, not suspecting she may make other more expensive purchases. They visit store after store and Mr. Pest, having spent all his money, is loaded down to the gunwales with all sorts of heavy and cumbersome merchandise. Besides the flat-irons and pail he is now carrying a watermelon, lawnmower, a garden hose, foot-tub, a large hat box, etc.

The scenes which follow are ridiculously funny. The young lady prefers to walk and her escort is a sorry sight when he finishes the two-mile hike. Up four flights of stairs to the young lady's apartments is the climax of a horrible journey—for Mr. Pest. And when they get inside a strapping big chap in a sweater and boxing gloves is waiting for them. The young and pretty Mrs. Smart introduces her husband.

Mr. Pest does not faint, but he makes haste to remove his cumbersome parcels and to "beat it" out of the house, tripping down the stairs in the tangles of the hose.

"PATRICIA OF THE PLAINS."—Patricia Watkins and her father the proprietors of the Lariat Saloon and dance hall, but because of his small size and his tendency to keep in a state of perpetual drunkenness the old man has little to do with the business. Patricia as a bar maid meets all the riff raff of humanity drifting across the plains to the West, and the Lariat Saloon is noted far and wide, not so much for the quality of its poisons as for the pretty maid who always offers a smile with the drink.

On the evening our story opens Patricia receives from the up-stage driver a box of bullion, with instructions to guard it carefully until the next day, when it will be picked up by the mountain stage. As the coach hauls up at the front of the saloon a man on horseback watches from behind a boulder, and satisfied the box is left in care of the Watkins', wheels around and rides down the trail. Next we see him join a confederate and after a short consultation both ride to the Lariat and enter. It is perfectly evident that the second man, apparently the master of the two, is greatly impressed by the girl's beauty, and after a few drinks he strikes up an acquaintance with the girl. Sheriff Dixon, who is also in love with Patricia, enters, looks the stranger over, but refuses to shake hands with him when Patricia offers to introduce her new friend. Later, when the girl leaves the saloon for the cabin, she turns Dixon down cold, and to further arouse his jealousy accepts the stranger's invitation to accompany her home.

An hour later Sheriff Dixon receives a note in which it is stated that Dick Martin, a highwayman, is in his vicinity and a description of Martin corresponds with that of Patricia Watkins' new friend. The sheriff loses no time in his effort to capture his rival. Riding first to the Lariat he learns that Martin is still at the Watkins cabin, but arrives there too late, as Patricia has hidden the bad man and informs the sheriff and his posse that he left an hour before. The sheriff shows Patricia a photograph of Martin and tells her that he is wanted and will swing if he is caught. However, the girl does not give him up, but when the sheriff leaves she sends Martin away, refusing to shake hands with him in parting.

Not long after Martin, who has tried to make his escape, is shot and wounded by the sheriff, but succeeds in eluding him while he makes his way on foot to Patricia's cabin. After hearing his story the girl takes pity on him and hides him in a loft just as the sheriff enters. Dixon makes love to Patricia and endeavors to take her in his arms. A drop of blood from the wounded man above splatters on the sheriff's hand, and in a rage he pulls down the ladder and orders Martin to come down.

The following scenes are intensely dramatic. Patricia suggests a game of cards in which the winner will receive, to have and to hold, Martin, the bad man. The girl wins in cheating the sheriff, and after the latter leaves the two go to each other's arms.

"ONONKO'S VOW."—In comparing America or rather the United States and our American civilization with European civilization, the remark is often made that "America has no ruins." While this is largely true, we have however, many spots in our land which are of absorbing interest. Deerfield, Massachusetts, is such a one. Here we have reminders of the old Colonial days and of the struggles of the Puritans on the then Western frontier against the Indians under Philip and against the French and Indians during the Queen Anne war. In the old memorial hall at Deerfield will be found many momentoes of those days. Lining the main street of Deerfield on either side still stand buildings which partly withstood the raid on Deerfield by the Indians and French in 1704. Historic spots are marked with slabs of granite with appropriate inscriptions thereon. At South Deerfield a monument stands sacred to the memory of Captain Lothrop and his men, who, under orders were escorting a train of ox-carts loaded with grain which was being taken from Deerfield to the military headquarters at Hadley in September, 1675. Lothrop's command is described by the historian and also the poet as containing "Young men who were of the very flower of the County of Essex and not one of whom was afraid to meet the enemy in the gate." In a moment of fancied security the men broke ranks and feasted themselves upon the grapes which lined the banks of a small brook then unnamed but now and ever since known as Bloody Brook, because of the fate which so quickly came upon them. Seven hundred Indians lay in ambush on either side of the stream and fell upon them giving no quarter. As one stands in the peaceful little New England town, it seems hard to realize that this awful massacre took place on that very spot a little over two centuries ago. The Colonists and soldiers under Lothrop had little chance to defend themselves in the Bloody Brook massacre but in the raid on Deerfield in 1704 remarkable instances are on record of the defense made by the hardy Puritans and Colonists against the Indians and French. The entire village within the stockade was destroyed with the exception of what is now known as the Frary House, which stood at the time and a large portion of which escaped the fire which the Indians set to the village. While the Indians and French were besieging the house of John Williams and the old Indian house in which many of the inhabitants had taken refuge, a wonderful fight against long odds was put up by Benoni Stebbins and the men and women of his household and their immediate neighbors against a large force of French and Indians who were held at bay by the intrepid Colonists and their devoted mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts. Some of the survivors of this awful raid rebuilt their homes in Deerfield and to-day there are many residents of that town who are proud of being their descendants. Among these is the venerable historian of Deerfield. Mr. George Sheldon, a man of wonderful intellect now in his ninety-second year.

It has been the good fortune of the Edison Company to secure a picture of Mr. Sheldon in our film. The story which is unfolded is begun by introducing Mr. Sheldon to the observer, in talking to some visitors to Deerfield. He assumes the position of the narrator of a story and the view dissolves into what he told. The story of Ononko's Vow is a pretty love tale through which is intertwined the story of an Indian's fidelity to his promise. The prologue takes place during the days of the Bloody Brook Massacre, when an Indian chief, one of the rescuing party, saves a young Puritan, Jonathan Smith, from the tomahawk of a hostile Indian. Ungagook is the name of this chief and he is accompanied by his little ten-year-old son, Ononko. Ungagook, unknown to Smith, receives his death wound in rescuing the latter. Together the chief and his son come to the house of Smith and as they see him safely to his door the Colonist's young wife expresses her thanks to Ungagook. The chief makes a gesture which is intended to convey the idea that he thinks lightly of what he has done and suddenly shows that he is mortally hurt. He expires in the home of Smith but before doing so has his little son, Ononko, promise fidelity to the family in whose house his spirit goes to the great Manitou.

Twenty-eight years later we see how Ononko, now a vigorous young brave, keeps the pledge which he made his father in the years gone by. Deerfield has been sacked. Jonathan Smith and his daughter Ruth, who has just been affianced to Ebenezer Dow, are driven before the tomahawks and flint-locks of the Indians. Dow has gone for assistance, managing to evade the raiders, and the rescuing party comes from the settlement below. Jonathan Smith is saved by a trapper but his daughter Ruth is among the Colonists who are being taken on across the meadow toward Pine Hill and thence to Canada. Ononko has seen the light in the sky from the village below and has hastened with the relieving party of Colonists and Narragansett Indians to the scene. He enters the room where the Colonists had stoutly defended themselves but where most of them were massacred. Failing to find his friend he seeks him without and meets him as he is leaving the awful scene of carnage. Learning from the father that his daughter is among the retreating Indians, Ononko promises to seek for her and bring her back to the grieving old man. The story ends in his successfully carrying out his promise. After the rescue, which is accomplished in a most thrilling manner, we see the young Colonist and his bride-to-be approaching the edge of the settlement under the guidance of the tall young chief of the Narragansetts. Behind them walks their friend the trapper. Ononko stands at the edge of the forest and points toward the settlement below. The three others pass him and turn to bid him goodbye, first asking him to proceed with them into the village. Ononko refuses. Why? Perhaps, because in the breast of the handsome savage some gentle thought of the girl he has saved has entered, but his nobility of character does not permit him to entertain the thought but for a fleeting moment. When Ruth was in captivity she was protected from the snow only by the woolen dress she wore. On the homeward march Ononko had given her his blanket to keep her warm. As he bids Ebenezer and his pretty fiance farewell, Ruth offers Ononko his blanket which she is wearing. The young chief prettily presents it to Ebenezer and places it across the shoulders of the girl. After accepting the gift the young people go to their home, their trapper friend accompanying them. Long Ononko stands contemplating the settlement below him. What his thoughts may be the observer is left to imagine. At the finish of the film we again see Mr. Sheldon bidding goodbye to the two young people who have been visiting his town.

This is but a brief outline of a story which is full of the vigor of the early days of the New England settlement and which breathes the atmosphere of reality as far as the Indians and the historical matter shown are concerned. The scenes at the time of the massacre at Bloody Brook were laid in the late summer and the leaves and foliage show in all their beauty whereas the scenes at the sack of Deerfield are laid in the winter and the ground is covered with deep snow. It is safe to say that no more realistic picture has ever been presented than this one. It is not a case of the Indian of the western prairie, who is engaged in cattle "rustling" or similar occupations, but we have here the representation of the early red man, showing his hatred of the white race and in this instance, particularly of the English, his willingness to ally himself with their enemies, his craftiness and subtlety as well as the noble and heroic elements of his nature. In "ONONKO'S VOW" we even have a suggestion of the poetic vein which made the Indians of Fenimore Cooper so lovable. In fact we may well imagine that the Ononko of our story is one of the descendants of the great Uncas. These remarks as to Indians must not be considered misleading for the story does not deal altogether with Indians. In fact the love story of Ebenezer is a very pretty one and the adventures which are portrayed show vividly the heroism not only of the men of the colonies but of the noble women who stood by their sides through all the trials and tribulations of those days.

The story of this film is vivid, patriotic, wholesome and soul-stirring and the pleasant introduction of so distinguished a man as Mr. Sheldon is most acceptable. Altogether a remarkable film.

"THE FOOTLIGHTS OR THE FARM."—Margaret is the pretty daughter of a farmer. She becomes stage-struck and decides to go to New York to begin a career. Her young sweetheart is informed of her intention and is heartbroken at the intelligence. Margaret reaches the great city and has the usual experiences of a great many young girls who start to climb the ladder of fame in the great metropolis. It is some time before anyone is attracted to her but finally she is engaged by a manager to play a leading part. It is necessary for her to spend nearly all of her savings for wardrobe but Margaret is not daunted by this as visions of stage triumphs flit before her eyes. The great day of the first rehearsal arrives about a month or so after her engagement by the management. Margaret reports for rehearsal. On the stage are gathered a number of persons; actors and stage attaches and at his table near the footlights sits the stage director accompanied by the stage manager. Margaret stands waiting for her part to be given out but is surprised and dumbfounded when no part is passed to her and her name is not called. She finally musters courage and steps up to the stage director, only to learn that he has never heard of her and that another young woman, an actress of experience, is about to rehearse the part. While the stage director is very sorry, he can do nothing in the matter. Margaret leaves the stage with saddened heart. Her great ambition has received a damper. She no sooner passes out through the stage door than she almost runs into her country sweetheart, John, to whom she unfolds the story of her wrong. John is immediately inclined to go in and punch the stage director's head but Margaret persuades him that this would accomplish nothing.

Finally he pleads with her to give up her stage ideas and come back to the farm. Margaret looks long into his eyes as if deciding between two careers. Finally John wins.

A very pretty conclusion to the picture is a scene in which we are shown the young people on either side of a weanling calf which is held by John and being fed out of a pail by Margaret.

A very entertaining story filled with pathos, comedy and a strong moral lesson strictly in line with the wholesome subjects being presented by the Edison Company.

"OVER MOUNTAIN PASSES."—This film taken by our special operator in South America shows us scenes in the Andes of Peru and will introduce an animal to many a spectator which he has probably never before seen, namely the llama, a native of Peru. This animal is described as having a camel's head, a sheep's body and the feet and legs of a deer. This is curious enough but when we find further that the llama besides being an extremely docile animal is largely used as a beast of burden, our interest is still further increased. We see a drove of them loaded at the mine at the top of the mountain and we watch them come down the steep mountain side, crossing the high passes and beautiful torrents. On the way down this drove meets another going up in the opposite direction and it is curious to see how the animals "flock by themselves." No member of one drove mixes for the fraction of a moment with the other. Through scenes of exceeding beauty they finally reach their destination and we see the copper ore unloaded for shipment at the mine warehouse of the railway station.

The film is one of great scenic beauty and decided interest.

KALEM CO.

"THE HEART OF EDNA LESLIE."—The Kalem Stock Company has put its very best into "The Heart of Edna Leslie," a dramatic production announced for the last week in this month. It is a society drama of modern times. Edna Leslie has become betrothed to Baron Haynair, an attache of the Austrian embassy, more in response to the call of ambition than to any real emotion of the part. But she honestly intends to marry the Baron until at a house party she happens to meet Peyton Carter, a young Virginian. Here a real love affair starts almost at sight, and ripens so rapidly that Edna has no good opportunity to tell Carter of her betrothal to the Baron. The latter appears on the scene unexpectedly and, of course, there is a serious complication, both men believing that Edna has been playing fast and loose, and cast her off. Distracted by the unfortunate turn her love affairs have taken, Edna breaks down and is stricken with brain fever, and the ravages of the disease are such that she totally loses her memory and has no recollection of preceding events. At this stage Carter shows that his love is a true love after all, for he has in the meantime learned of the nature of Edna's betrothal to the Baron and his sympathy as well as his love goes out to the unfortunate girl. He starts to woo her the second time and naturally wins her just as he did originally. It is the betrothal which occurs the second time exactly as it did at first that restores her memory, but this time she finds that he believes in her, trusts her and that there is no danger this time of her being cast aside.

The production is put on amid beautiful surroundings and the life and personages portrayed are characteristic of the social life in America of to-day. Without a doubt this superb production will make the most favorable impression wherever it is shown.

"SPOTTED SNAKE'S SCHOOLING."—In "Spotted Snake's Schooling" the Kalem players offer another study of Indian temperment. In this story the leading character is a graduate of Carlisle, who returns to his tribe in obedience to the command of his father, an uncivilized chief, there to take up the primitive Indian life. He is subjected to a vigorous test given to each young Indian before he becomes an accepted brave, and fails miserably; though red in color, he is no longer an Indian at heart, and the old chief, chagrined at his son's transformation, casts him forth from the tribe. The young Indian then gets a job working at a ranch. Here the ranch owner's daughter, a pretty Western girl, looks upon him as an interesting protege, and in many ways does him little kindnesses. The Indian mistakes these kindnesses, however, and is emboldened to make love to the girl. Naturally the white girl promptly spurns him, and again he is an outcast, neither a red man nor a white.

The theme is exceptionally powerful and has been worked out most admirably by the Kalem players, now thoroughly versed through long experience in the portrayal of the various types of the story.

"A HOME MELODY."—It is not unusual in the home where the taste for music prevails we will find strong evidences of love and culture.

Seated at the harp, Mrs. Leslie is playing that instrument. Mr. Leslie at the piano and their little girl sings, producing a beautiful home melody which is greatly appreciated and enjoyed by their friend and visitor, Mr. Blank.

On the edge of a placid river Stella, the little daughter, is seen making her way to a canoe which is partly drawn up on the shore. She gets in it just as her mother follows and lifts her from the boat, and they wander through the fields to a shady tree, where Mrs. Leslie seats herself with her arms lovingly about Stella's shoulders and gradually falls asleep.

While the mother is sleeping the child goes back to the river and the canoe. Her father comes along, and the child, leaving her teddy bear in the boat and dropping her hat, runs to him. He carries her across fields, where they find the mother sleeping, and go on in their romp and fun.

The mother awakes, misses her child, rushes to the river, discovers the canoe, which has been upturned, then she sees the child's hat and teddy bear. Her mind is deranged by the shock; she tries to throw herself into the stream and is prevented doing so by two men who hear her screams of anguish and come to learn the cause. She wanders along the river bank and disappears.

The husband learns of her derangement and immediately notifies the police, who institute a search, but finds it fruitless. The poor woman goes aimlessly about until she is found by the friend (whom we saw in the first scene) playing the harp of a street musician, instinctively feeling for the melody of home.

The friend takes her to her family. She does not recognize them until she comes in contact with her harp, upon which she begins to play the home melody; the friend has the husband play the piano and the child sing. Gradually reason is brought back on the tender strains of the home melody, and with it happiness and unity.

"HER ADOPTED PARENTS."—Her grief is intense, accountable perhaps by the years of companionship with her parents, who she mourns, and probably by the fact that she has remained a spinster to prevent possible separation from those she loved. Regularly at each meal served in her home the woman has two seats for the loved ones as if they were in the same places they occupied at the table when living. This she seems to do religiously as a sort of memorial.

The depression of loneliness becomes so great she buys a small house in the country where she can spend her summers. The house is occupied by an old couple who are so reduced in circumstances they are dispossessed and obliged to go to the poor house. The maiden lady, who has now moved into the place, learns about the old couple from a neighbor. She goes to the poor house to see them. She is deeply and favorably impressed with the old people, and in memory to her parents and a desire for companionship she asks the couple to become her adopted parents and make their home with her. The old gentleman is willing that his wife should go with her, but with becoming independence prefers to stay at the public institution.

The old lady goes home with her foster daughter, but cannot bear to be separated from her husband. She sneaks out of the house at night and returns to the poor house and her life partner. She left a note telling her good friend that she has gone to join her husband.

The good woman discovers the absence of her adopted parent, finds the note, upbraids herself for separating the old folks, and immediately goes to them and tells them she wants them both to live with her. She persuades them to accept her as their daughter, and they are all back in the old couples' home of many happy years, to remain in still greater happiness for the balance of their lives under the adoption and care of a daughter whose love and respect for her own parents made her love and respect others.

"THE BACHELOR AND THE BABY."—Secretly married, Letty Holcomb is now the mother of a sweet little baby boy. She is impatient that Hugh Channing, her husband, announce their marriage and give the child its legal name. Hugh, who is presumably a bachelor among his friends, refuses to publish their wedding, and while he is living in swell apartments Letty is living in a couple of poorly furnished rooms trying to protect herself and baby from calumny and shame. Her husband not only refuses to make their wedding public, but he entirely denies it, sending her a statement that it was a mock ceremony.

Crushed and stunned, she feels helpless. Recovering from the blow, she decides to strike back, goes to the apartment house where her husband lives; she lo-cates his rooms, which are next to a suite occupied by a young bachelor named Benson, who is engaged to be married to a very pretentious young lady of aristocratic importance.

The young wife returns to her home, takes her baby and carries it to Hugh's apartments, with a note telling him she is going away and leaves his child for him to support and care for.

In her excitement and anxiety she mistakes young Benson's apartment for her husband's, and leaves the baby on the bachelor's bed and makes her escape from the building without being observed.

The young and aristocratic fiancee of young Benson sends him word that she is coming with her mother to visit his rooms and learn some of the mysteries of a bachelor's life. They arrive and are charmed with his rooms, but are very much startled and shocked when they discover the baby in his rooms. Benson is as much mystified as they are, and, rushing into his bedroom, they find Letty's baby and the note. The mystery deepens; the ladies are horrified and the engagement of Benson and the young lady is discontinued and she refuses to have anything more to do with him.

Disappointed and lonely, Benson sympathizes with the poor kid, and resolves to adopt it as his own and forever remain a bachelor. Hugh Channing is taken fatally sick, sends for Benson, and before he dies gives him a confession that he had lied when he told Letty that her marriage to him was a sham and he had grievously wronged her.

The child grows to be a bright and handsome boy, and Benson finds him a very companionable chum and they pass most of their spare time together. One summer at the seashore the boy tears his trousers. Benson takes him to a young seamstress, who lives there, to have her repair the boy's clothes. While she is measuring the boy's waist she see a ring on his finger and recognizes it as the one she had tied around her baby's neck when she left it in Benson's room. She asks Benson about it—he tells the woman his knowledge of the child and she learns that the boy is her own child. Benson shows Letty her husband's confession, and while she is happy at finding her child he hates to be separated from him, but the situation is easily relieved when they find that they are both in love with each other in their mutual love for the boy, and decide they can better care for him by becoming husband and wife.

"BILLY'S SISTER."

An Interesting Western Drama From G. Melies' Studios.

Drink, like laughing gas, brings out the strongest trait in a man's character, or rather, subdues all but the strongest, making that one doubly prominent. Of the weak it makes fools, to the jovial it lends wit, and into the veins of the strong puts fearlessness and adventure. The strong man of the ignorant, impetuous nature becomes the drunken brute.

"Black Pete," the village bully in Melies coming Western drama, "Billy's Sister," is of this last type. When in the state of inebriation he looks for trouble, and it is a pretty well established fact that anyone who looks for trouble gets it sooner or later.

On the particular day that this thrilling drama opens, "Black Pete" stands among a group of idlers before the village saloon, intent on a fight. A fight he must have, and when no one challenges him, he attacks an innocent bystander, which action on his part causes those about him to flee in fright.

Now Billy, hero of this story, is just the opposite sort of person. Of a quiet, seclusive nature, he has gone west to run a ranch, by which he supports his sister to whom he is dearly devoted. Billy is in the woods reading a letter when he spies "Black Pete" brutally attacking a young Indian girl. In his zeal to rescue the Indian maid from the drunkard's clutches, Billy throws the latter to the ground with such force that Pete, whose head strikes a rock, is killed. Billy has committed murder. To be caught near the body would mean, not a trial, but lynching for Billy. The Indian girl realizes this and grateful to him for having saved her from an awful fate, swears secrecy and hastens his departure from the scene.

Billy flies to his sister for aid and this clever little girl suggests that she don his cowboy clothes while he escapes in plain clothes.

Then follows the exciting part of the drama, for in his haste, Billy left the letter near the dead man, and Pete's friends are soon hot on his trail.

The sister's ruse fools them all, for they give her an exciting chase on horseback while the brother makes for the Eastern express. Not till the lasso is around her neck do the men discover their mistake and by that time Billy is safely on the train that rides him to freedom.

"Billy's Sister" will be released Oct. 6, 1910. Its approximate length is 950 feet.

patrons. The admission price at the Palais Royale is 10 cents.

There is no official censorship of film in Quebec City, but there is a strong and firm moral censorship, and an offensive picture is subjected to immediate complaint to the authorities, which ends in its being hastily withdrawn from exhibition. The licensed product, it need scarcely be stated, is seldom, if ever, subjected to this drastic measure.

Montreal Theatres.

In speaking of the type of the average picture theatre in Montreal, Mr. Bergh considers that it is not up to the standard. Besides, in the smaller houses the exhibitors care little for the quality of service, and judge of that service by its cheapness. There are several handsome theatres, however, with first class picture programs, such as the Gaiety, the Ouimet, the Nickel and the Wonderland. The admission price at all these houses is 5 cents. Pictures and songs, without vaudeville, form the entertainment.

In Montreal the picture theatres run on Sundays, that is, in the French-speaking section of the city. No theatres are open, however, in the English-speaking section. In all the other cities and towns in the Province of Quebec, the Sunday closing of theatres is strictly observed.

Mr. Bergh laid special emphasis on the fact that the patrons of picture theatres in Montreal include the very best citizens. And he also drew particular attention to the high license paid by exhibitors, viz., $500 a year; a very high tax on the receipts when the 5-cent admission and other expenses are considered. The best theatres in Quebec and Montreal use the K. O. Co.'s stock exclusively, Mr. Bergh assured me.

The View In Ottawa.

The average picture theatre in Ottawa is of a higher type than the average Montreal house, although it is not quite up to the fine average type to be found in Quebec City. The Majestic, a first class house that comfortably seats 400 people, is patronized by the elite of the city, and is always well filled during business hours. The owner and manager, Mr. Stapleton, is spoken of by Mr. Bergh as an enterprising business man and a genial gentleman, who knows the exhibiting end of the picture business thoroughly. It is needless to state that the K. O. Co. supplies the Majestic with films and also all the other high class picture theatres in the city. Pictures with songs form the ruling feature in all the best Ottawa houses, and 5 cents is the prevailing price charged.

Injustice of Censorship in Toronto.

The most striking feature of the picture business in Toronto, in Mr. Bergh's eyes, is the gross injustice of the system of film censorship in force.

In Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, while there is no official censorship, there is a delicate, yet strong, moral censorship that prevents the exhibition of improper pictures. Exhibitors in these cities know that, if they offend, the authorities will not wink at the offense, and so great care is exercised by them. In Toronto every police constable on the beat is a censor of moving pictures. It matters not to this eminent critic of pictures and morals that the National Board of Censors of New York, formed of leading citizens and the representatives of eminent reformative and social organizations, have passed on the film; and it matters not that the Chicago Board of Censorship, one of the strictest in existence, may have placed the stamp of its approval on the film, the ordinary Toronto policeman—weighed down by the sense of his own importance and by the autocratic authority given him—turns his thumbs downwards and the picture in question become unclean.

While Mr. Bergh was in Toronto, a meeting of exchange men and exhibitors was held to discuss this pernicious discrimination against pictures, and a request was framed asking the authorities to appoint a censor of pictures, a man of discernment and judgment and possessing the necessary qualifications. At the same meeting the clergy of Toronto were requested to appoint delegates, who could serve as a committee to pass on pictures before exhibition, and thus save exhibitors from the tyranny of the system now in vogue. Let us hope that good will come of the meeting.

What abou the managers of so-called legitimate theatres in Toronto? Are their hands clean in this matter? They are pretty close to those in authority. Is there jealousy over the success of the irrepressible moving picture, and has it been resolved to relegate it to the muck heap? You can't do it, you know.

A Good One On Buckwalter.

There is a good one on H. H. Buckwalter, manager of the General Film Co., at Denver, these days, and it is lucky that the boys in Chicago are so many miles away, else it would require a bulky roll to call them off and pronounce things square.

It appears that when the genial Buckwalter first opened his exchange in Denver, he established himself in very modest quarters—in a small shack, in fact, where there was just room enough for him to turn around without bursting out a side wall, after allowing space for his furniture, equipment, etc.

As time passed and his business increased he was forced to look for roomier offices. Then a happy inspiration seized him. He decided to build his new offices, so as to include the shanty already occupied by him. Thus the work of building went on all around him, and he was still able to conduct business at the old stand.

The new offices were duly occupied and the contents of the home of pioneer days were placed amid the modern surroundings; our friend, Buckwalter, smiling contentedly meanwhile over the foresight which had saved him the annoyance and trouble of moving.

It was only recently that the aforementioned "foresight" received a knockout blow. That was when "H. H." was appointed manager of the General Film Co., and he was required to make his headquarters in the former offices of the Kleine Optical Co. in Denver.

The day of moving came and, after carting several loads of the smaller stuff to the new quarters, the foreman of the workmen approached Mr. Buckwalter with a troubled look. He had contracted to transfer all the stuff for so much, but found that some heavy mining machinery, formerly stowed in the old shack, could not be taken through the largest door of the new building, which had been erected around it!

It is not known at the present writing how "Buck" settled with the foreman, nor has it been revealed whether he broke a hole in one of the new brick sidewalls or dynamited the machinery. At any rate, we can afford him some consolation by reminding him that the old Vicar, in the "Vicar of Wakefield," committed a similar blunder. He ordered a painting so large that the frame failed to go through the largest door in the vicarage. It was easier, however, to buy a new frame for the painting than it will be for "Buck" to tear down and rebuild a sidewall.

The drinks are on you, "Buck!"

Praise for the Edengraph.

The following letter was recently received from George H. Hines, manager of the new Lyda theatre, this city:

"I feel it my duty and in keeping with my past reputation as a picture exhibitor and critic to say that I have not changed in the least, but am stronger than ever for pictures, as I fully realize that they are still young. I will acknowledge that my first night pictures were bad, but all I ask is that you drop in now and see the difference. We now have our machine properly adjusted and open and close the show with the latest Patents Co. pictures.

"We are now featuring our pictures, and the Edengraph machine is doing great work. I think it the finest machine made. Come and see for yourself."

Chicago Film Brevities.

W. H. Hodgkinson, of the Progressive Film Company, of Salt Lake City, stopped over in Chicago Saturday, Sept. 17, on his way to New York.

A. W. Goff, formerly manager of the Kleine Optical Co., in Denver, left this city Sept. 13 for Vancouver, B. C., to open an office for the Kleine Optical Co.

H. H. Noyes, owner and manager of the Vaudette Theatre, Valparaiso, Ind., was a visitor last week. Mr. Noyes boasts, and with reason, of the fine pictures projected at his theatre, and he is confident that no theatre in the country can "pull it over" him in the projecting line. Mr. Noyes manufactures his own light with a 5 h. p. motor and generator. The light for his picture machine is furnished by this current. The daily cost for lights, generator and all is about $1.00. The Vaudette seats 265 people and runs moving pictures with songs. No vaudeville has ever been used in this house. The Vaudette has a fine four-piece orchestra, consisting of piano, first violin, cornet and clarinet. Two of his daughters play the piano and violin, the pianist also being the singer of the songs introduced. Mr. Noyes is one of the oldest licensed exhibitors in the business, and holds license No. 52.

C. S. Sullivan, who now manages the Royal theatre in each of the cities, Hancock, Calumet and Ishpeming, all in Michigan, visited The Film Index offices last week. The Royal will be opened Sept. 26, and will be booked in conjunction with the other two houses of that name. Mr. Sullivan has eliminated illustrated songs and confines his program to moving pictures only. Mr. Sullivan is a strong believer in posters, and uses thirty 1-sheet litho posters for every reel run by him. He uses 12 reels weekly in each of his houses. He reports business as being excellent.

Tom Summers, owner of the Pastime, a new theatre in Ottumwa, Ia., which will be opened in about two weeks, was in the city last week and contracted for a high class service with the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street. He also purchased a machine and supplies.

Messrs. Carey & Rich, owners of the Myrtle theatre, on Milwaukee avenue, this city, opened that new theatre last Thursday, Sept. 22. They get their service from the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street, from whom they also bought a machine and supplies.

John Olson, and J. C. Smith have built a new theatre, the Star, in Beloit, Wis., which will be opened Saturday, Sept. 24. They were in the city last week and arranged for their bookings with the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street.

A WORD ABOUT CARBONS.

Advantages of Hard Carbons Discussed by R. F. Pierce of the Charles L. Kiewert Co.

While most exhibitors appreciate the necessity of securing a light of the best possible quality for the projection of motion pictures, the manner of producing this light is to most laymen more or less of a mystery. As a matter of fact, it is extremely simple and easily understood, and we believe that a simple, non-technical description of the electric arc and the means used to produce it will be of interest to readers of The Film Index, and in many cases point the way towards a solution of difficulties which have heretofore existed.

The production of light from the electric arc depends upon the fact that electricity in flowing from the positive carbon into the hot gases or "arc," composed of the gases produced by the burning carbon, and then into the negative carbon, causes minute particles of carbon to become detached from the negative carbon and to rush up-stream with enormous velocity, striking upon the positive carbin and raising a portion of it to a white heat. With direct current the flow of current is continuously in one direction, and therefore one carbon, which in motion picture machine lamps is always the upper one, produces all the light. In alternating current the direction of flow reverses with great rapidity, generally about 120 times per second, and under these circumstances the crater, as the white-hot portion of the carbon is called, forms on both upper and lower carbon.

The amount of light produced depends upon two factors: the amount of current sent through the arc, and the hardness of the carbon. The harder the carbon, the greater the temperature it will stand without unduly rapid disintegration, and the greater the amount of light that can be produced by a given amount of current.

The color of the light depends upon the voltage at the arc, which is in proportion to the arc length. A very short arc, such as is produced by a very soft carbon, produces a light of yellowish tint. On the other hand, if the arc be drawn beyond its normal length, a bluish light will be produced. The normal length of arc depends upon the hardness of the carbon to a great extent, and a hard carbon will stand a much longer arc than a soft one.

Soft carbons of satisfactory quality can be manufactured much more easily and cheaply than hard carbons, and the ordinary moving picture machine carbons are of a very soft quality, which makes it necessary to run a very short arc. This necessitates a very fine adjustment of the arc, and requires that much care and attention be given it to prevent the lower carbon from getting in the way of the light from the upper, and throwing a "ghost" on the screen.

In the "Bio" carbon the processes of manufacture have been so perfected as to make a high voltage carbon of suitable quality available for the market. It shows a considerably longer life than the ordinary projector carbon, the increase depending upon local conditions. The average increase of life is in the neighborhood of 25 per cent. to 40 per cent.

Another feature of this carbon is the production of an absolutely pure white light, which could not be obtained by the use of the softer carbon. Also, on account of the hardness of the carbon, about 30 per cent. more light is obtained with the same consumption of current. The most remarkable fact is, however, that the light is even more steady than that produced by the soft, or low voltage, carbon. One of the great difficulties in the way of the manufacture of the high voltage carbon heretofore has been the difficulty of obtaining a steady arc at the higher voltage. In the "Bio" carbon, however, the core is filled with materials of secret composition that render the arc even steadier than could be expected with the very softest of the ordinary carbons.

It might be well to state here that the common practice of referring to cored carbons as soft, and solid carbons as hard, is entirely wrong, as these terms properly applied refer only to the density of the body of the carbon itself.

With any carbons there are three conditions, and three only, which must be met to secure good results. First, the carbons must be set in the propor position, both with relation to each other and with relation to the centre line of the condenser. With a soft, or low voltage, carbon, burning with a very short arc, this is one of the most troublesome tasks connected with the operation of the lamp, and is probably to blame for more troubles than any other one thing. With the high voltage, long arc carbon, the management of the arc is much simpler, and it is much easier to keep the arc in its proper position. The second condition is that the proper amount of current, or the amperes flowing through the carbon, should be properly proportioned to the amount of light required and the dimensions of the carbon. The third condition is that the voltage at the arc be suited to the particular grade of carbon used. It is worth while mentioning at this point that in the various current saving devices used on alternating currents, the taps marked, for instance, "20," "40" and "60" amperes, respectively, do not signify that when the lamp is connected on these taps, this amount of current will necessarily be forced through the arc. It only means that with one particular grade of carbon in the lamp, and set at a certain arc voltage, the rated amperage will flow. For instance, a very soft carbon operating at about 35 volts on the arc might consume 40 amperes on the 40 ampere tap, whereas, if a high voltage carbon requiring say 38 or 40 volts at the arc were connected even on the 60 ampere tap, possibly not more than 18 or 20 amperes might flow through the circuit. The operator should not, therefore, assume that if his lamp is connected on the 60 ampere connection that he is obtaining 60 amperes through the lamp.

In the great majority of cases no trouble is experienced in using high voltage carbons in connection with apparatus already installed. In a few cases, however, where the supply voltage is considerably below the rated voltage of the circuit, it will be necessary, in order to obtain the advantages of the high voltage carbon, to have the current saving device rewound. As these advantages are so enormous and the cost of rewinding so trifling, the gain is worth the expense many times over. However, to accommodate the few who might not wish to take any chances, we also supply a soft or low voltage grade, which, while it does not offer the advantages of the high voltage carbons, is reported by users to be by far the best of the soft or low voltage carbons now on the market. However, less than 1 per cent. of our customers find it necessary to use the low voltage grade, and they do not consider it necessary to refer to it, except to call attention to the fact that troubles are some times due to the causes set forth above, and that these troubles may always be overcome by the selection of a carbon of the proper quality.

"INDIAN'S GRATITUDE" FULL OF ACTION.

The Pathe American production entitled "An Indian's Gratitude," out next Saturday, has an abundance of action; there is not an idle moment in it. The accompanying scene is from the closing scenes of the picture. Throughout the picture the scenic effects have been well chosen. Especially beautiful is the view of a waterfall which the Pathe producers have worked into the picture with good effect.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Production by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"YOU STOLE MY GAL."—By Branen and Lange; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co., New York. A song on a new theme, which teems with clever lyrics, such as Jeff T. Branen always produces, which, coupled with an inspiring melody, predestines this song a hit. The slides are one of Wheeler's novelty sets. Every slide a novelty and every novelty a screamer. When Wheeler gets hold of a good song he may be depended upon to do it full pustice with slides. This set is full of humor rarely found in song slides.

"I'M JUST PININ' FOR YOU."—By Williams and Van Alstyne; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. These writers need no introduction to the music-loving public, as to the quality of their work, and they certainly have not failed in this instance. Wheeler has given us another set of his excellent moonlight slides, the kind that illustrate so well a love ballad. Each slide is of a rich bluish tint with light effects.

Scott & Van Altena.

"JUST A DREAM OF YOU, DEAR."—Words by Milton Weil; music by F. Henri Klickman; published by Victor Kremer, Chicago. The lyrics tell of a young man who has day-dreams of his sweetheart. His love dreams are interpreted very interestingly in slides by Scott & Van Altena.

"NIGHT AND DAY."—Words by Jeff. T. Branen; music by Evans Lloyd; published by J. T. Branen Co., Chicago. For this song Scott & Van Altena have produced a set of slides that abound in pretty water scenes and contain many novelties of unusual merit.

"ANY OLD TIME OR ANY OLD PLACE."—Words by J. Brandon Walsh; music by A. W. Brown; published by Victor Kremer, Chicago. The set of slides for this song are unusual because they contain both summer and winter scenes. "Any old time," whether night or day, summer or winter, they are all here. The set is picturesque and taking.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"LITTLE PUFF O' SMOKE, GOOD NIGHT."—Words by R. D. Lardner; music by "Doc" White; published by Victor Kremer Co., Chicago. This is one of those tender little melodies that haunt you; easy to sing, which is, after all, the real test of a song's popularity. The lyric is extremely good and Simpson has made a great set of pictures for this lullaby. There are some striking novelty slides in this set.

"SONG BIRD."—Intermezzo by Harry M. Alford; published by Shapiro. A real novelty in Indian pictures has been put out by Simpson in this set of slides. The Indian papoose and the young brave are shown on a piebald pony and in true Western surroundings. The Indian encampment and tribe, camp fire, &c., are shown, also the lovers riding away to their new-found happiness on their honeymoon.

"PLAY THAT BARBER SHOP CHORD."—Words by William Tracey; music by Lewis F. Muir; published by J. Fred. Helf Publishing Co. This song is the feature song of the Lew Dockstader show this season, and is also being sung with great success by Bert Williams. Two really clever artists posed for this song, and Simpson was right there with that wonderful camera of his to reproduce with such rare fidelity to nature just the exact expression that would best convey the spirit of the song. The two models are Miss Carlotta Freeman, late of the Pekin Stock Co., and Lawrence Chenault, of the Smart Set Co.

Levi Company.

"WILL YOU LOVE ME WHEN THE HONEYMOON IS OVER."—Words by Al. Bryan; busic by Fred Fischer, writers of "Any Little Girl That's a Nice Little Girl is the Right Little Girl for Me;" published by Shapiro. A great novelty song, with a catchy melody that will be heard everywhere. Slides are almost all novelties.

"COME, JOSEPHINE, IN MY FLYING MACHINE."—Words by Al. Bryan; music by Fred. Fischer. This is an airship song that should make a big hit. The slides fit the song to perfection and contain some very original novelties.

HALLBERG EQUIPS NYACK THEATRE.

C. W. Borsdorf, proprietor of the Nyack theatre Nyack, N. Y., placed order this week with J. H. Hallberg, New York City, for a double dissolving Motiograph moving picture machine, Hallberg Double Lamp Economizer and 24-inch exhaust fan. This is one of the most up-to-date theatres in New York State and Mr. Borsdorf is bound to please his patrons. He also placed order for two 4,000 c. p. flaming arc lamps for the front of the theatre, which is a fine advertising medium.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Part of "The Deluge" Swept Down Broadway Last Saturday Night and Was Swept Back Again On Sunday Night.

Some wonderful sights are seen on Broadway. Last Saturday the great "White Way" looked as if a circus were in town when the large procession of elephants, giraffes, camels, lions, tigers and other animals, two of a kind, were moving down the thoroughfare in the direction of Brooklyn Bridge on their way to Noah's Ark and the Vitagraph Company's studios, where "The Deluge" is being portrayed for release in the near future.

It was necessary to employ these animals on Sunday and move them on Saturday night. Realizing that the better the day the better the deed, everyone of the quadrupeds and birds acted in perfect accord with the importance and grandeur of the occasion and the day. They seemed to appreciate that they were taking part in a Biblical play and reverently did their part of the picture as Shem, Ham and Japheth assisted their father in getting them under cover before the rains descended and the waters covered the face of the earth.

On Tuesday, Sept. 24, we will see "Her Adopted Parents," a very pretty homespun drama; Friday, Sept. 30, we will be treated to "A Home Melody," a pathetic drama; Saturday, Oct. 1, "A Bachelor's Baby," a hit, a very palpable hit; it needs no epilogue.

CASUAL COMMENT

NOW it is the New York World that is conducting a little crusade against motion pictures. For the past week that publication has filled a column or two of space with rather hypercritical reviews of pictures, shown for the most part in licensed theatres, which would make it appear that the burden of responsibility for the production of offensive pictures was upon the shoulders of the "licensed" manufacturers, shared in a measure by the Board of Censorship.

From the liberality with which the World has devoted its attentions to "licensed" pictures its self-appointed mission in behalf of the community have some of the earmarks of a "plant" from the first.

Just at this time it is doubtful if there is a higher moral status in any branch of public amusements than has been reached, and is being maintained by the manufacturers of licensed motion pictures. It was, therefore, a bad time for any newspaper to undertake, honestly, a task like that which the New York World has set for itself.

As before observed, a "plant" was suspected from the first. This suspicion was amply confirmed by the World itself when it began to quote the source of its information.

It has been the boast of the New York World that it gets its information from reliable and responsible sources. Its editor may be laboring under the impression that his informant is a reliable person and a trustworthy guide in matters concerning motion pictures.

He may believe the statement to be true that the Board of Censorship winks at the lapses of the "licensed" manufacturers and is most severe in its criticism of the product of the makers of so-called "independent" pictures.

Whether he believes the statement or not, he has given it publicity in the columns of his paper and committed himself to that questionable view of the censorship.

Of this phase of the question there may be more later on.

THAT certain individuals employed by or connected with the so-called "independent" picture interests are responsible for the present attitude of the New York World, there is not a possible doubt. Those persons imagined that, by starting a crusade against "licensed" pictures, they might possibly bolster up the fast failing cause of the "independent" interests.

Let us suppose that the efforts of the New York World should result in something like a rigid police censorship in New York and other large cities along the lines suggested by that paper's criticisms. What would happen? Of the twenty reels—more or less— alleged to be produced by the "independents" each week, not half would get by the censors.

SO far the critic of the New York World has confined his investigations to "licensed" pictures only. What a mess he will uncover when he gets to the "independent" product, if he ever does.

At the present time a very small percentage of pictures released by the "independents" are submitted to the National Board of Censorship, and almost no attention is paid to the recommendations of that board in the case of those that are censored when excisions of objectionable scenes are ordered.

Few of the "independent" makers can produce a picture that will pass even the most lax censorship. Rigid censorship would leave them little more than the titles.

Few "independent" makers even pretend to submit their pictures to the Board of Censorship, hiding behind the cowardly pretense that the board is controlled by the "trust" and that they cannot get a fair deal.

The plain truth is that they are making pictures the character of which will not bear scrutiny when it is for the purpose of cutting out the scenes of violence and vulgarity for which "independent" pictures are noted.

ON the other hand, the "licensed" manufacturers have nothing to fear from newspaper crusades. The history of such movements is that they come and go and are soon forgotten. They are conceived in a desire for sensationalism and exert a small influence upon either the community or upon its officals.

The attitude of Mayor Gaynor of New York upon the picture question is well known. He will be governed by reason and not by newspaper clamor. When it comes to suppressing the actual evils of the picture business no one will co-operate with him more earnestly than the licensed manufacturers.

FAVORS LONG STORIES

Manager Steuerle of Louisville, Says Good Old Stories Should Not Be Cut to Get in One Reel

Some time ago The Film Index was advised by Manager Louis F. Steuerle of the Broadway Amusement Company, Louisville, Ky., that he was about to run the Vitagraph three reel subject "Uncle Tom's Cabin" for several days and would advise us of the result. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" seldom goes south of the Mason & Dixon line, so we were curious to know what would happen. Mr. Steuerle's letter tells the story.

Fully as interesting is the deductions that Manager Steuerle draws from his experience with that subject, and his remarks are submitted to the careful consideration of the manufacturers. There is a point made by Mr. Steuerle that seems to be well taken. It is that well known and familiar stories or dramas should not be cut to keep them within the regulation 1000 foot reel. Mr. Steuerle cites an instance of this and concludes, from his experience that picture patrons will welcome subjects of two and three reels when they are delineations of familiar stories. Read what he says about it:

In answer to your request, I write you regarding the success we had with the Uncle Tom's Cabin show. The entire three reels were shown at the Broadway theatre on the 25th, 26th and 27th of August. The show was advertised by a slide on the screen and by circulars. The business done in these three days was the greatest since we were in business, which is now over three years, exceeding even the "Life of Moses." (The entire five reels of this were run as a complete show).

From the Broadway theatre the three reels were shown at three other houses in this city, and each of the houses broke all previous records. Later we played a return engagement and we were unable to accommodate our patrons, although we have a capacity of about 900.

From the above it is clearly shown that the public want more pictures that will last an hour or more and will take up two or three reels. The short story of a half reel is good enough for a comedy or a farce; or an ordinary story may take up an entire reel, but good stories or plays ought not to be cut down and butchered, thus leaving out many good parts and incidents. The half or one reel stories, no matter how good, are soon forgotten, while the longer stories, such as the "Passion Play," "Life of Moses," and "Uncle Tom's Cabin," linger in the minds of the public until their dying day.

Picture plays should be treated the same as plays on the stage. If a company of actors would render three or four different plays in one night, the people would get disgusted and walk from the theatre, for the play does not become interesting, nor is the plot disclosed until after the first act. There is enough comedy that can be interspersed in the picture drama to amuse those who favor comedy, just as "Topsy" for a few minutes brought a smile to those that witnessed the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" show.

To illustrate, we will give the following example: Some nights ago, we showed "Human Hearts." made by the Selig Company. The picture is beautiful, but many interesting and important incidents are cut out. The story is entirely too short, and the imagination must be very elastic. You have the opening scene, a moment later the marriage, then a year passes, then four years, etc. The tramp part is much more important, and the child visiting her father in prison is not shown at all, besides several of the scenes were snow scenes, but there appears no snow in the picture at all.

This criticism is not meant in an offensive way, but is the sentiment of the patrons who have seen the actual performance. The audience is left in the dark as to how the tramp gathered the evidence, and the ending, if we remember correctly, the woman (Jenne) is killed by a bullet fired by Ford at Tom Logan, instead of dying from heart disease, or whatever the cause might have been. In this regard the film manufacturers have no right to change the plot or incident of a play, because as a general rule the audience is educated in the plays upon the stage.

We believe that about once a month a three-reel drama ought to be enacted, and for the subject an old favorite American play ought to be used, such as "The Power of the Press," "The Old Homestead," "The Silver King," "The White Slave," that can be more easily referred to the plays that "father used to see." We believe that many others voice the same sentiments,

Respectfully yours,
LOUIS F. STEUERLE.

BERST RETURNS

Pathe Freres' American Representative Reports Great Development of Firm's Business

Among the host of returning tourists who crowded the capacity of the SS. Kaiser Wilhelm II., which reached port on Tuesday, Sept. 27, was Mr. J. A. Berst, vice-president and American representative of Pathe Freres, who has been in Paris during the past month.

Mr. Berst reports the business of his company in Continental Europe and Mexico to have increased in wonderful proportions during the past year, compelling a material enlargement of the Paris plant.

"I met the representatives from Berlin, Buda Pesth, and Mexico at the home office and learned that the business of those branches had almost doubled. I cannot imagine where it all comes from, but it comes.

"Pathe Freres now do a large renting business in France, and are preparing to extend this branch of the business to Germany, Spain and Italy.

"Our American studio is now well under way and will be completed within the contract limit, December 1, 1910. Our American subjects seem to be satisfactory, but we hope to do even getter work in the new studio."

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 5.—The 3-wire direct current system is generally supplied by two separate generators connected in series.

The current is distributed over three wires, the middle one of which is called the "Neutral."

It is essential that on a 3-wire system, the load in amperes on either side be kept the same, or as nearly so as possible.

If a 3-wire system has to supply a greater number of amperes on one side than on the other, it is likely that the side with the greatest load will supply a lower voltage than the other side.

The main advantage of the direct current lies in the fact that it is generally of low voltage and is particularly suitable for arc lamps and small motors.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 6

Alternating Current.

You have been advised in our last "Electrical Talk," that direct current flows in one direction and is therefore also called "continuous current" in other words, it flows out over one wire through the lamp or motor back to the dynamo over the second wire, thus completing the circuit.

Alternating current derives its name from the fact that it alternates, that is, it goes back and forth between the dynamo and the lamp or motor making a complete reversal of the current many times per second, depending upon what is called the "frequency," also called the "Cycles" of the circuit.

In order to make this matter more clear to you, I herewith call your attention to Figure (5), which illustrates a water power system. Referring to the illustration:

A is an elevated water tank.
B is a receiving or storage water tank.
C is a pump.
G is a water motor.

They are all connected by pipes D, E, F, and H.

Suppose we start pump C lifting the water from the lower tank through pipes D and E filling upper tank A, there will be created a water pressure through pipe F at the motor G. If the starting valve on the motor is open, the water will cause the motor to rotate, discharging through pipe H into the lower tank, thus completing the continuous flow of water, which it takes power to create through the pump C and which is available at another point through the water motor G. This is a good representation of the direct current electric generating system, in which the pump C and the tank A would represent the electric generator and the water motor G, the electric motor.

Referring to the illustration, A is the cylinder of an engine having a piston D, which can exert movement of a crank, shaft and fly wheel through the piston rod K. The cylinder A is connected by two pipes E and F with another similar pump cylinder B having a piston C connected with a piston rod. The operation of this water system is as follows:

By moving the piston rod and consequently the piston C towards J, that is, by pulling it out as if it were connected to a crank, the water J will be compressed and forced up through the pipe F into cylinder A on the side indicated by I, creating a pressure on motor piston D which will, through piston rod K, start the engine backwards. When the piston C has been pulled out to a stop, the water pressure will cease and engine A would stop, but its fly wheel will carry the crank over the center as it would in any kind of an engine. If we now push the piston C backwards towards G, the pressure will force the water up through pipe E into the chamber. Pushing the piston D and piston rod K towards I — completing the backward motion of the crank, shaft and fly wheel of the motor A. It is evident that by moving the piston in the cylinder B back and forth the fly wheel of the motor A can be kept in continuous motion, as the water pressure changes alternately from side I to side H of motor piston D and vice-versa.

Here we have the simplest form of an alternating current water system in which the pump B is the dynamo as compared with an electric system; pipes E and F are the wires and A is the alternating current motor. The process of operation is extremely simple, and the illustrations can be easily understood by reference to the above description and illustration.

Anyone can understand that in Figure (5) the operation is continuous in one direction being very smooth without interruption and the water motor turns around without oscillating motion and can never stop on a dead center.

With the alternating water system in Figure (6) however, the movement of the piston in the water motor A is oscillating and the motor can not be started if the piston is at either one of the extreme ends of the cylinder A. In other words, we have as on any ordinary single cylinder engine, 2 dead centers, indicated at L and M in Figure (6).

The alternating current single phase system has exactly the same effect on a motor. It has a dead center on which it is impossible to start the motor unless first revolved by hand or unless other means for inducing the starting of the rotating member of the motor is introduced.

Having established in our mind the fact that an alternating current has one or more dead centers or periods when no power is generated or delivered at the instant the current is being reversed, we come to the conclusion that an alternating current is the kind which surges back and forth through the circuit, and while the voltage may be 110 or any other number of volts at a given instant there are other moments at which time there is absolutely no voltage on the system. It is of course necessary to make these reversals of the current so frequent that when the current has to be used for electric lighting, there will be no serious interference with the continuity of the light which is more difficult with arc lamps than with incandescent lamps.

Summary.

The alternating current is so named because it oscillates or reverses in other words, goes back and forth over the same wires and through the same lamps and motors many times a second.

The alternating current may be of any given voltage but this voltage is only apparent because at the instant of each reversal of the current there is no voltage generated.

Due to the fact that there are moments of no voltage on an alternating system, it is necessary to make the frequency or change of reversal many times per second in order to maintain the illumination constant.

In our next talk we will further discuss the Alternating Current.

NOVEL HOUSE FOR PORTLAND, ORE.

Several old frame buildings on Grand avenue between East Burnside and East Couch streets, Portland, Ore., are being torn down to give place for the latest and most down-to-date motion picture theatre building in the city. This structure will be built on entirely different lines from any in the city, and will be fireproof.

The screen upon which the pictures will be reproduced will be on the front wall of the building instead of the rear wall, as in most other showhouses, and will be above the doors. There will be the regular entrance and exit doors and also two other double doors between these which will be arranged in such a way that pressure from the inside will open them outward. This makes an entirely open front in case of fire or panic. The little enclosure in which the operator works with his inflammable films is in the rear of the building, and people must not pass under or near it, as is at present the case. The supports of the floor are all concrete, and the walls of the building are of brick. The seating capacity of the new theatre will be 400.

A novel feature of the building will be the heating plant. The air will be kept in circulation by a one-horse-power fan, five feet in diameter. In the summer this fan will distribute cold air and in the winter will circulate warm air. Six hundred and fifty thousand cubic feet of fresh air per hour will be sent through the theatre.

Otto Kleeman is the owner and architect of the building. The structure will be 25x88 feet and will cost $5,000. It is to be completed by November 1.

NEW HOUSE FOR McKEES ROCKS, PA.

Island avenue, McKees Rocks, Pa., is to have a new motion picture amusement place, to be located at the corner of the avenue and Cutler street. Ground has been broken for the building, and the contractor is at work for a speedy completion of it. The enterprise is headed by Messrs. Isaac Weller and H. D. Nixon, two hustling young business men, who will conduct it in a modern and up-to-date manner, giving everybody the worth of their money.

The structure will be 30 feet wide, with sufficient depth for ample seating capacity, and the stage will be very large, offering ample scope for the proper showing of fine motion pictures. It will not be many days before this new playhouse will be ready for the public.

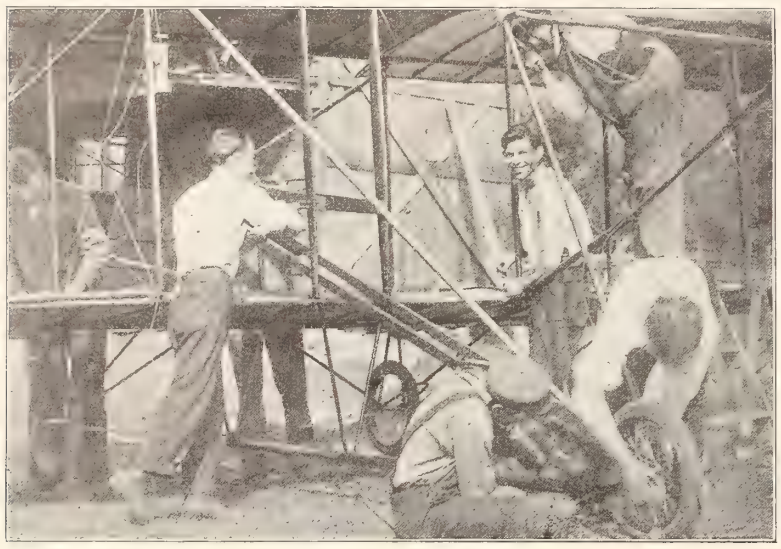
INTERESTING AVIATION SUBJECT

Pathe Industrial With a Comedy Ending

JUST now, when everybody is thinking and talking flying machines, the Pathe subject, "Aeroplanes in Flight and Construction," will be received with interest. The details of building a flying machine are shown by views of the work of construction in progress at the Hammondsport, N. Y., workshops of Glenn H. Curtiss. The pictures show how the different parts are made and assembled into the complete machine. The method of shipping is shown when the machine is taken apart and packed in four separate boxes. It is all very interesting.

Scenes of aeroplanes in flight were taken at the aviation field, Sheepshead Bay, New York. The manbirds, Ely and Bud Mars, are the subjects of the picture man's work. They are shown starting their machines, soaring about in the atmosphere and returning to the ground.

On the same reel of this highly educational and industrial subject is an exceedingly funny trick picture called "The Aviation Craze." The old student of aviation is working out a problem in aeroplanes and falls asleep at his task. Immediately the formulas which he has chalked upon the blackboard become animated and perform wonderful feats, developing into balloons, box kites and planes, with the operator in charge, who performs wonderful aerotic stunts, from crossing the English channel to a long dive to the bottom of the sea. He escapes, however, and all the formulas return to the blackboard just as the old professor wakes up. It is a very appropriate ending to the industrial subject.



ASSEMBLING AN AEROPLANE.

A SUMMER FLIRTATION.

Pathe's American players have put across another good farce comedy under the title of "The Summer Flirtation." Two young men go to the seashore, where they meet a very charming girl and become rivals for her affections. She is indifferent as to which furnishes her the desired entertainment and the rivalry between the young men is pronounced. After some preliminary skirmishing, in which neither gains any advantage, definite dates to call upon the young lady are made.

The boys decide to take a nap before filling their engagement, and while one is asleep, the other applies shoe blacking to his face, and then falls asleep himself. When the first one awakes, he seems not to realize his own plight, but proceeds to apply the same treatment to his slumbering friend. It may well be imagined that a warm reception was given the black face comedians when they called upon the girl, and their treatment of each other when the trick is discovered is rather strenuous. But differences are patched up and they shake hands over it at the finish.

EIGHTY PER CENT. OF PICTURES CENSORED.

Secretary Collier Defends Censorship Board and Praises Its Work. Managers Who Show Bad Pictures Should Be Legally Punished.

At a meeting of the Yorkville Civic Forum in the Hungarian National Hall, 321 East 73d St., New York city, Wednesday night, John Collier, of the People's Institute, Educational Secretary of the Board of Censorship, spoke in defense of the censors in their work with moving pictures. He said:

"There are periodical outbursts in the newspapers against the moving picture theatres, and in these attacks the Board of Censorship is generally by implication involved. There are certain things the Board of Censorship is responsible for and certain things it is not responsible for, which can be readily made clear.

"The Board of Censorship does a national work, inspecting moving pictures before they are placed on the market. When a picture is condemned, or a change is made, this verdict is made effective for every copy of the picture shown in the entire country. The Board of Censorship has correspondents in cities throughout the country, who receive weekly bulletins from the Board and are thus able to notify, the Board in any case where its verdict has not been put into effect.

"The censorship has existed for a year and a half, and probably eighty per cent. of all the pictures seen in theatres have been reviewed by the Board of Censorship. Of the remaining twenty per cent., some are undoubtedly bad. There is no way on earth to suppress these pictures except to watch each individual theatre—there are ten thousand picture theatres in America—and when the picture is shown, punish the management legally and then confiscate the picture by legal process. These pictures are lodged on the shelves of hundreds of exchanges in a score of cities.

"The Board of Censorship operates through agreements with the manufacturers of motion pictures. The ever-diminishing percentage of pictures issued prior to the time the Board began its work, have passed out of the ownership or control of the manufacturers and out of the jurisdiction of the Board of Censorship. They must be taken care of by the police of each city and by local reform bodies that are equipped to inspect the theatres in their neighborhoods.

"As for the pictures issued since the censorship began, the Board stands squarely by its verdicts, which are reached by a committee of social workers, acting in a volunteer capacity and absolutely free from the trammels of obligation of any kind to the moving picture business. A picture cannot be judged by the sensational or inimical description of it which may be published in a newspaper. Neither can it be judged by the flaming poster which may be hung in front of the show, for such posters generally have no relation to the picture whatever. Why, I saw the Passion Play in moving pictures recently advertised by a poster showing the elopement of a modern couple in evening clothes over a garden wall. The picture theatres on Fourteenth street and the Bowery are special offenders along this line.

"When motion picture theatres are criticised for lack of precaution against fire, for bad air and the like, this again is a concern of the local poiice, fire or building department of each city. In New York, excellent work has been done in the past year toward the improvement of the picture shows and theatres generally, and the city departments ought to get credit for their progressive handling of a complicated problem. Much remains to be desired. We are assured by the Mayor's License Bureau, by the License Bureau of the Police Department, and by the Bureau if Violations of the Fire Department, that any complaint against picture shows will be promptly investigated and remedied. At present all these departments are making more or less thorough, periodical inspection of all the picture shows in New York."

WILBERT TIMMINS OPENS BIJOU.

Wilbert Timmins, of Lebanon, N. H., has opened the Bijou theatre and motion pictures will be seen at the popular prices. Mr. Timmins was a favorite with the public while at the Lyric and he will preside at the piano and sing at each performance. The first performance occurred Wednesday evening and a large crowd attended.

NEW HOUSE FOR WARREN, R. I.

Charles Stetson, who moved his family from Forest Park to Providence, R. I., last spring and went to work with Frank Stetson in the Chrystal Palace Cafe, has gone into business for himself. He opened a motion picture theatre in Warren, R. I., last week and the enterprise promises to be very successful.

On the opening night of the new theatre, Mr. Stetson was greeted by an attendance of 1,200 people. Mr. Stetson is being assisted by his sons and there is every prospect of him having inaugurated a business that will be paying.

"ROUGH RIDER'S ROMANCE"

A Kalem War Story

THE KALEM subject, soon to be released under the title of "The Rough Rider's Romance, or a Tale of a Cuban War," contains a feature that will be of interest to young folks. Those who have not gone canoeing may not know that to kiss a pretty girl in a canoe is an undertaking attended by considerable danger, unless you know exactly how. In the opening scenes of this picture this peculiar amatory feat is illustrated. Those who will follow the directions may indulge in the pleasant pastime without danger of upsetting.

But this is not all there is to the picture. It is a story of a young soldier who is called to war and leaves an affectionate sweetheart behind. In one of the engagements he is severely wounded and recovers his health only through the attention of a pretty Red Cross nurse, whom he afterward marries, at least out of gratitude if not for love. There is a rather heart-breaking scene when the soldier brings his bride home and meets his former sweetheart at the station. There are other dramatic scenes in which the Kalem players demonstrate their ability to portray emotions and strong passions.

The battle scenes are especially realistic. Cavalry scouts are first shown reconnoitering the enemy's position. Then the infantry charges up the hill in open order and captures the position. It is in this battle that the hero of the story received his injuries.

The closing scene of the picture is the interior of the rough rider's home. Some very unique and beautiful lighting effects are obtained here. Throughout a number of backgrounds of surpassing beauty have been incorporated in the picture, which testify to the excellent taste of the producer. There are several garden scenes that are most homelike and altogether delightful.

NEW ORDINANCE FAVORED.

A substitute ordinance regulating the motion picture and penny picture machine shows in Kansas City, Mo., was drawn August 26 by F. M. Hayward, assistant city counselor, after a conference with Senator A. L. Cooper, representing the picture men, and J. C. Chafin, head resident of the Swope Settlement, who has been interesting himself in various phases of the business. It is understood that the ordinance meets with the approval of the picture machine owners.

The ordinance prohibits the exhibition of any pictures, either by the machines which throw them onto a screen or the penny machines, that are immoral or suggestive. All pictures must meet with the approval of the secretary of the board of public welfare and receive a permit from him.

Another section provides that no child under 14 years of age shall be permitted to work, act or perform in any of these places. The enforcement of this probably will do away with the present "amateur night." The penalty for violating the ordinance is a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $500 for each offense.

The ordinance has yet to be considered by a special upper house council committee. It was said that it may be made stronger by prohibiting the exhibition of pictures showing crime scenes.

KEARNEY, NEB., WILL HAVE NEW THEATRE.

In a couple of weeks Kearney, Neb., is to have a new theatre, P. H. Hoppen, of the Crescent, having rented the east room in the Hub building and is now having it fitted up. Arrangements for the best films being manufactured have been made and as soon as the interior of the building is ready the programs will start. E. A. Schwarz, the partner of Hoppen in the management of the Crescent, will have charge of that theatre and will continue to run it on the first class basis which this management has maintained since the acquisition of the resort.

Kearney, as soon as the new theatre starts, will have no dearth of good shows, for the programs, at the new theatre, which will be known as "The Gem Theatre" and at the Crescent will be changed so that new pictures will be shown each night. Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday the programs at the Crescent will be changed, and Monday, Wednesday and Friday, new films will be shown at the Gem. The management of each show is determined to present the public with the best that can be obtained in the motion picture line and owing to their work this past season which has given them an excellent reputation with film makers and the theatre going public they will be able to outstrip any competitors in this field.

ESSANAY WESTERN OFFERINGS

"The Bearded Bandit," a Feature — "A Cowboy's Mother-in-Law," a Comedy Hit

FAIRLY settled in their new Western quarters at Golden, Colo., the Essanay Western stock company, now numbering 28 people, and ideally equipped, are making up for their two months' vacation with an average output of two or three reels of film each week. The company has encountered but little unfavorable weather and has been working from sun-up to sun-down and with splendid results. The new negative car, especially equipped for their season's long jaunt through a half dozen Western states, has proven its value above all expectations. Nearly all film made by the Western company is developed in the car and made ready for the printing machines as soon as they are received by the Chicago factories.

SCENE FROM ESSANAY'S "BEARDED BANDIT."

In the Essanay Guide, dated Oct. 1 to 15, are descriptions of three Western pictures, just completed by the new company. "Patricia of the Plains," released Oct. 1, is the first release of the new company, and while many of the members of last season's company will be seen there are many new faces. "Patricia of the Plains" proved an intensely interesting picture and obtained well deserved applause from the picture fans. The acting is excellent, the story strong in plot, while the scenic backgrounds show the admirable descrimination and good choice which is characteristic of all the Essanay's product.

"The Bearded Bandit," released as a feature, is another Western drama, with an intensely interesting plot, and excellently interpreted by the Essanay Western players. As the story goes, Jim Connors, a ranchman of good repute and high standing in his community, turns bandit and so skillfully disguises himself that there is not the least shadow of suspicion around his other self, the ranchman.

Jim has a daughter, Nan, who is loved by Curt Wilson, the county sheriff, and the two become engaged when Jim hands the young lady over to the sheriff with the request to "take good care of her if anything happens to me."

The "bearded bandit," who has already obtained considerable notoriety due to a number of sensational hold-ups, has by this time aroused the ire of the law abiding citizens of the county and the sheriff's visit to the Connor's ranch house is not only to win the father's consent to his marriage to Nan, but to also enlist the careful watchout for him he saddles a horse, arranges his disguise and rides up the mountain trail to wait for the stage coach.

The hold-up is successful and later when Sheriff Wilson and his posse have started in pursuit of the bandit, Connors audaciously joins them in their search for the wily highwayman. Needless to say, the search is a failure and the disheartened sheriff and his posse return to town.

Some few days later Connors is fatally shot in a card game at a saloon in the town and makes the request to one of his friends to bring Nan to him. When the girl arrives and she and her father are left alone Connors pulls from his breast the black beard and mask worn by the bearded bandit, with the request that she use them in identifying him as the bandit and thus receive the reward. But when her father slowly drops back in her arms she lays him down tenderly and rising thrusts the black beard and temptation into the stove.

The boys enter a moment later and find her weeping by her father's side, little suspecting the double character of their long time respected friend.

"The Cowboys Mother-in-Law," is a comedy and is claimed to be even funnier than "The Ranger's Bride" or "The Little Doctor of the Foothills," two of the recent famous cowboy comedies from the Essanay Western department. The story, briefly, is of the marriage of "Cayuse" Charley, who tires of matrimony and abuses his wife. "Cayuse" has won the girl as the choice among a dozen others and when the little matron, finally takes her domestic troubles to her former sweethearts, they plan to teach "Cayuse" a lesson.

After much thought they decide that Nellie's mother come down and take Charley in hand but Nellie tearfully informs them she is an orphan. After more thought one of the boys is persuaded to play the part of a mother-in-law to Charley. The outfit is obtained and the big cowpuncher, arrayed in feminine wig and skirts, would send any man's heart to his throat if he thought of having trouble with "her."

She arrives, and after thoroughly subduing "her" abusive son-in-law, invites him to kiss her but when "Cayuse" feels the rough chin he feels there is something wrong.

Instantly he grabs for his mother-in-law's wig but is stopped when the big barrel of a large revolver is thrust into his face. Before he has time to confirm his suspicions about the validity of his supposed mother-in-law, he is requested to sign a pledge never to abuse his wife again, upon the penalty of being shot by any of Nellie's gentlemen friends. Cayuse promises and then the big cowpuncher pulls off his wig.

However, "Cayuse" is cured, and when the film closes we have the intimation that they "lived happily ever afterward."

The film is pronounced a winner and in the hands of the excellent Essanay players there is ample assurance of its proving a laughing hit.

SCENE FROM ESSANAY'S "COWBOY'S MOTHER-IN-LAW."

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

THE great interest taken in Kinemacolor by all actively engaged in the moving picture industry naturally invests any announcement concerning it, or its progress, with a peculiar importance. In the experimental stage as yet, this system promises marvelous future developments; and, since all progress in the scientific field must be measured by results, the public announcement of such progress must be made in cold, rigorous, unerring, scientific fashion. When commercialism seeks to dominate either science or art, it usually follows that it gets a slap in the face, and is compelled to take its proper seat and await the time for action.

This brief preamble has its purpose, as I shall now proceed to show.

Sometime ago, a friend of mine, an intelligent exhibitor, who makes Kinemacolor his hobby, drew my attention to an advertisement placed in the "Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly," of London, in its issue of August 18, by The Natural Color Kinematograph Co., Ltd., of this city. As the advertisement referred to created the impression that Kinemacolor pictures, as shown in the Palace Theatre, Shaftesbury avenue, London, had not been presented under such favorable auspices as their merits warranted, this exhibitor decided to ascertain the facts and had his exchange forward a letter to the manager of the Palace Theatre.

For the benefit of the reader, before proceeding further, the following extract from the aforementioned advertisement is given: "Having more ambitious views for the permanent establishment of Kinemacolor in London than recent conditions would allow, Mr. Charles Urban announces the withdrawal of motion pictures in natural colors from the Palace Theatre, on Saturday last, 13th inst. (August 13)." The parenthesis is mine.

The letter addressed to the Palace Theatre management was as follows:

"We notice in the 'Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly' an announcement by Mr. Charles Urban to the effect that he has withdrawn motion pictures in natural colors from your theatre, giving the inference that your house could not do them justice.

"We are interested in natural color photography as applied to films and have been watching the progress of Kinemacolor closely.

"If we are not imposing upon you, would you kindly write us whether the colored films were voluntarily withdrawn from your house by the owners, or whether you, yourselves, closed the engagement because the pictures were either unsuccessful in drawing the public or were not technically all that was claimed for them."

The following letter, dated Sept. 15, was received in reply:

"I have your letter of the 1st inst., and do not think I can do better than send you copy of letter which my directors have to-day addressed to the Editor of 'Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly.'

"I may add that my Board greatly appreciate your having called our attention to these mis-statements, which would otherwise have escaped our notice.

"Yours faithfully,
M. E. BENJAMIN, Secretary."

Subjoined is a verbatim copy of the letter sent by Dr. Benjamin to the Editor of the "Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly," on Sept. 15, last.

"The attention of my directors has just been called to a paragraph in your issue of the 18th ult., and to an advertisement of the Natural Colour Kinematograph Company, stating that Mr. Chas. Urban has withdrawn the pictures in natural colors from the Palace Theatre, and to a further letter in your issue of the 25th ult., from an official of the Natural Colour Kinematograph Company replying to the paragraph in your previous issue.

"It is not true that Kinemacolour was only shown here at the 'fag end' of the programme, as during the rare occasions when we were supplied with interesting subjects, prominence was given to the exhibit in the middle of the programme.

"It is not true that Kinemacolour was withdrawn by Mr. Urban, for, as a matter of fact, the agreement under which it was exhibited, and which you are at liberty to inspect should you so desire, could only be terminated by my board, and it was in consequence of the poor exhibition of pictures that we received, with rare exception, from the Chas. Urban Trading Company, Kineto Ltd., and the Natural Colour Kinematograph Company, that we decided to end the agreement.

"My board regrets that the Natural Colour Kinematograph Company, after the long exhibition of Kinemacolour they gave at this house, and after Mr. Urban having admitted, in answer to complaints from my board, that we had grounds for so doing and that if we would be patient a little longer everything would be rectified, they should now speak in such disparaging tones of the house which has helped them more than any other source, to give publicity to Kinemacolour; but, since they have chosen to do so, we feel there is no alternative but to ask you to give publicity to the above facts.

"If we had considered Kinemacolour worth retaining upon the terms of the agreement, we should certainly have kept it in our programme."

It certainly looks as if Mr. Charles Urban is "getting in bad" on both sides of the ocean.

Selig's Crowning Masterpiece.

The Selig Polyscope Company is now busily engaged in the production of the first of the big surprise films which were hinted at in my last letter. Mr. Selig recently purchased all the rights and stage effects—mechanical and otherwise—of the "Neal Burgess County Fair," and a company, with supernumeraries, of between 400 and 500 people is at present producing the sensational scenes and incidents of the well known piece in picture form, at the Selig plant. Mr. Selig purchased the rights direct from the Burgess estate, through its representatives, Sanger & Jordan of New York City, Mr. Burgess having died about six months ago.

The first stage production of the "County Fair" was made under Mr. Burgess' direction, in the old Union Square theatre, 14th street and Broadway, New York, in the early '80s, and had the second longest run ever achieved by a play in the Empire City, "The Old Homestead" carrying off first honors. For over four years the "Neal Burgess County Fair" entertained the multitudes that thronged to see it in New York, and every year since, throughout Europe, this country and Canada, it has been always a welcome feature to old and young. A new generation has sprung up since its first presentation and production, but it still possesses the elements that ensure it perennial youth.

In picture form the great horse race scene, that astounded and enthused the millions who saw it, will be shown exactly as in the days of Neal Burgess' fame. Eight thoroughbred and perfectly trained horses will be shown in the race, as pictured by the Selig people, and all the mechanical contrivances and scenic effects will be seen.

This will be the first film of its kind ever made, and, as the Selig rights prevent anyone else from employing similar devices, it will always stand as a signal display of Selig enterprise. The "Ben Hur" production also used mechanical devices similar to those of the "Neal Burgess County Fair," in the great race, but an order from the Supreme Court of the State of New York estopped the owners of that play from continuing to use the racing devices, as it was an infringement of the patents held by Neal Burgess.

I am told that the negative of the film will be completed by Saturday, Oct. 1, and that the date of its release will be announced in the near future.

The Picture Business in Cincinnati.

A. Dresner, manager of the Magnetic Film Service Co., of Cincinnati, was in the city from Sept. 22 to the 25th. His main object during his stay was to make arrangements for securing reprints of old, popular reel subjects that were run several years ago. Mr. Dresner is going to test these old subjects, and he believes that many of them will bear repetition, as the majority of the picture lovers of to-day did not see them when presented several years ago. Mr. Dresner is getting out special posters and heralds for these reprint reels, Hennegan & Co. of Cincinnati doing the printing.

Mr. Dresner considers the picture theatres of Cincinnati the best built and handsomest in the country. There are about 100 theatres in all, 80 of these being licensed houses. To the stranger, unacquainted with the city ordinance governing theatres and picture houses in Cincinnati, it might appear strange that in no case, not even in the most costly picture theatre, is the capacity over 300. The fact is

"THE LEGACY"

A Drama of Home, Sweet Home
A Vitagraph "Life Portrayal"

HAPPINESS is a personal asset and it is ours for the taking and yet most persons are trying to purchase that which they already possess, in fact, most persons don't know "where they are at." Experience is a great teacher.

"Mandy," old farmer Jones had often remarked to his good wife, "it must be mighty slick to be worth a pile of money like Uncle Bill and the rest of them 'big bugs' in New York City and just do nothin' but enjoy yourself." "Well, Hiram," his good wife would reply, "'tain't for you and me to be complainin' of the Lord and His mercies. It's beyond us to be hankerin' for what the Lord never intended we should have. I guess we'll have to be contented by lettin' well enough alone."

Little did these good people know how soon they would find out for themselves what it meant to be the possessors of a great fortune and live like Uncle Bill in the city.

The unexpected change in their circumstances comes when they receive a letter from an attorney in New York stating that "Uncle Bill" had died and they had inherited his fortune with this one condition—that they remove at once to New York and live in the mansion which the uncle had occupied before his death. The old folk cannot restrain their joy; their dream of wealth is realized and they act like a couple of children.

Preparations are completed, they close up the old home and start for the city residence and live like the "Four Hundred." We watch their journey to and their experience in the city. The tall buildings, the crowds and the hub-bub confuse and bewilder them until they are lost. They fall asleep on a park bench, are rudely awakened by a policeman who calls a taxicab and sends them to their mansion on Fifth Avenue. They are met at the door by a retinue of servants who insist upon taking their baggage, dressing them for dinner, waiting on them at the table and, as Hiram put it, "feeding them jest like they was babies or invalids." The last straw comes when the servants place them in separate bedrooms and insist upon parting them, the first time in forty years.

They manage to get together during the night and discuss the situation. They come to the conclusion that they didn't know when "they was well off" and the best thing for them to do is to hike for home as quick as the good Lord and the railroad trains could get them there. While all the servants are still sleeping they quietly steal away and leave Uncle Bill's mansion and all his riches to those who were poorer than themselves and needed it worse than they do.

They reach home, sweet home thoroughly satisfied that contentment after all is great riches and they are willing to continue in the enjoyment of that happiness and peace which was theirs and they knew it not.

This is a picture, a poem without words; takes us into memories pure and deep and portrays the true principle and philosophy of life.

SCENES FROM THE VITAGRAPH LIFE PORTRAYAL, "THE LEGACY."

VITAGRAPH NIGHT ON NEWSPAPER ROW.

Will Long Be Remembered as an Event in that Staid Business Section.

At the Park Row Theatre, New York City, in the heart of the business section, Miss Florence Turner, the "Vitagraph Girl" was given a cordial reception last Monday evening. The lobby was decorated with posters and banners announcing a "Vitagraph Night" and the appearance of Miss Turner. The place was crowded to the doors.

After the running of "The Wrong Box," a film in which Miss Turner is featured, Mr. Spedon, the Vitagraph representative introduced Miss Turner by saying: "Most people are anxious to see in reality or person what the participants in moving pictures look like. You will find the 'Vitagraph Girl' a person very much like ourselves—just an ordinary, every day young lady —with extraordinary talent and ability known throughout the world by her clever performances in the Vitagraph Life Portrayals.

"It may not be known that these productions are shown in all sections of the globe. Today we had a gentleman from Johannesburg, South Africa, who exhibited Vitagraph pictures in his theatres, visit our studios to see how we produce pictures which he had seen in far off Africa. This by way of explanation. By way of introduction I take great pleasure in presenting Miss Florence E. Turner, The Vitagraph Girl, who will speak for herself and show you what manner of person she really is."

Miss Turner came forward and stepped on a box which had been placed for her to stand on, she greeted the audience with, "Good evening everybody. So much has already been said about me, so many nice things, I hardly know where to begin, although I feel very secure in knowing I am on and in the right box tonight. It gives me more pleasure to see my audiences than it can possibly give my audiences to see me. This is an opportunity which is seldom given a moving picture actress—to see her audiences. I often wonder if they like me and I hope they do. I certainly love you all and thank you for this hearty welcome you give me tonight. I wish to congratulate and compliment Mr. McClintock on the beautiful theatre which he conducts and the refined and splendid audiences which attend his performances."

When Miss Turner got through she was surrounded with a garden of bouquets and baskets of flowers. Mrs. Louise Gethens Trimble sang "The Vitagraph Girl" in a rich contralto voice which penetrated every corner of the theatre and elicited a hearty response in the singing of the chorus and loud applause at the finish.

Mr. Spedon then introduced "Jean, the Vitagraph Dog, who is featured in many of their films. Jean was put through several of her stunts followed by the exhibition of "Jean, the Matchmaker," a picture in which the dog displays remarkable intelligence and ability.

As "The Vitagraph Girl" left the theatre in the Vitagraph touring car the reception outside was almost as enthusiastic as the one she received inside.

"The Vitagraph Night" is unquestionably an enjoyable extra feature as well as a profitable one to the exhibitor.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Peter C. Naylor, an exhibitor from Johannesburg, South Africa, visited the Vitagraph studios last Monday. He evinced great interest in the manner of doing things which he had so often seen on the screen but had never seen accomplished. He had no idea of the vastness and perfectness of the Vitagraph plant.

Noah and his sons are still busy building the Ark while hundreds of idolaters are dancing, looking on and chaffing them, little knowing that they will soon have to be drowned in the deluge which the Vitagraph wonder workers are preparing to let loose at the right moment. "The Deluge" is going to be some great picture, and we will have something to say about it a little later on.

"Francesca Da Rimini," the magnificent play concerning the marriage of the beautiful daughter of the Lord of Ravenna to Gianciotto of Rimini. This is an Italian classic, undescribably beautiful in acting, scenery, costume and every essential in the perfection of a masterpiece, which this Vitagraph portrayal most assuredly is. It will be issued in November.

We can expect some more portrayals in which "Jean" and some other celebrated dog actors are featured. Those already released have made such a pronounced hit the Vitagraph Company will release others in the very near future.

"THE SANITARIUM"

A Ripping Farce Comedy by Selig

James S. McQuade

SUNNY skies, invigorating breezes, laden with the perfume of orange groves and the eucalyptus tree, and all the other beneficent influences that combine to make life a gladsome comedy in the aureate clime of southern California, have evidently put the members of Selig's Los Angeles stock company in the happy mood that finds expression in the desire to make the rest of the world laugh and enjoy the wholesome pleasures of life with them.

Their exuberant, exhilirant mood, in this especial instance, has vented itself in "The Sanitarium," one of those mirthful, silent farce comedies in which the fun is as furious as the action is brisk, and where humorous incident jostles against comical situation with a frequency that makes one's ribs complain loudly against the tyranny of laughter.

The characters in this farcical skit are in the charge of highly capable actors, the principal roles being sustained by such well known people on the legitimate stage as Hobart Bosworth, M. B. Curtis (of "Sam'l of Posen" fame) and Miss Williams, the first and last mentioned being formerly prominent members of the Belasco stock company of San Francisco.

This film subject abounds in situations of an original, novel and side-splitting character, and the story itself is of unusual conception. The daring scheme of a young spendthrift, who is "hard up," in converting his rich uncle's country residence into a retreat for patients suffering from nervous diseases, is far away from the ordinary, and the manner of treating them reveals a series of unlooked for and startling surprises that are certain to keep spectators in a roar. For instance, think of discovering a harmless, insane musician, fully dressed, seated in a full bath tub, playing his violin with the soulful aspect of a great artist; or of his being invested with those symbols of a policeman's authority—a helmet and a club—and ordered to clear the sanitarium of its patients! Imagine, too, the picturing of the scenes that follow in quick succession, at the entrance to the sanitarium, showing the rush of the inmates as they escape helter skelter from the building to avoid cracked skulls and bruised bodies. And what a motley crowd they make, these men and women, some only half clothed, others with one shoe on and the other off, the man with the gouty foot breaking sprinting records, and the woman with the nervous temperament a close second! And, to cap the climax, just as one wonders how the madman will finish up, he rushes into the arms of the officer whose helmet and club have created such dismay and havoc.

The pivotal point of the story lies in the receipt, by the scapegrace nephew, of a telegram from his uncle which states that he and his wife have postponed their trip to Europe, and that they are returning home to ascertain if a lost necklace has been left on the premises. Just a moment before, he had forced all the patients to pay him in advance and now he is forced to return the money and turn them out of the house. He is ably assisted in his sanitarium scheme by a trusty valet, and it was the latter who thought of the novel plan of clearing the premises, having first deprived a policeman of his club and helmet.

The climax is a scream, for the last echo of the bedlam created by the crazy musician had scarcely passed away until a second telegram is received, bearing the tidings that the lost necklace has been found and that the trip to Europe has been resumed.

"The Sanitarium" will be released Oct. 10.

J. A. Lapp, of Indianapolis Would Not Abolish Five Cent Theatres.

A feature of the sessions of the Indiana State Conference of Charities, held at Marion, Sept. 12th, was a discussion of "The Child and the Five-Cent Theatre." This took place at the Juvenile charities round table.

John A. Lapp, legislative reference librarian at Indianapolis, told of an investigation made by the theatres in Indianapolis by the agents of the Children's Aid Society. He said there are about 50 of these motion picture shows in that city (Indianapolis). On the night the investigation was made the attendance of children was about 3,500. It is estimated that about 10,000 children visit these shows in the course of a week. Mr. Lapp said that a close investigation failed to discover any pictures that are obscene, but the trouble was that many of the films depicted crime in startling detail and this had a bad effect on the children.

Mr. Lapp was opposed to abolishing the motion picture show. He regarded it as one of the greatest institutions ever produced for good, and he believed that it should be regulated so as to produce educational pictures instead of sensation. He said he hoped the day would come when every church, every club, every institution for the betterment of the child and the adult would have a motion picture show, and he thought the matter should be taken up for the schools and these pictures used for educational purposes.

There was some talk, he said, of establishing a board of censors in Indianapolis for the five-cent theatres, but after the matter was discussed it was decided not to do so because a large per cent. of the films are censored by the national board of censors in New York, and the proprietors of the places in Indianapolis are favorable to clean pictures as a business proposition. However, Mr. Lapp was of the opinion that no child under 14 years of age, should be permitted to visit picture shows unless accompanied by their parents.

NEW THEATRE FOR MIAMI, FLA.

The motion picture business is becoming so prosperous in Miami, Fla., that D. H. Kelly, the pioneer motion picture man of that city, has decided to build another first class picture theatre.

The new house will be built of stone and will be absolutely fireproof. By being situated next to the Ullendorff building, on Avenue D, Mr. Kelly has chosen the most desirable spot in the city. All the winter visitors do their shopping along Avenue D and the house can't help but attract attention.

The stage of the new theatre will be large enough to accommodate first-class attractions.

UP TO DATE HOUSE FOR MOOSUP.

Harmidas Couture, of Moosup, R. I., has sold to Stevens & Jackson of Baltic a lot of land on his Main street property on which they are erecting a house for the exhibition of motion pictures, etc. The land comprises a frontage of 55 feet and has a depth of 100 feet. On this is to be erected a structure 40x95, to be of wood but finished inside and out in pressed steel, which on the outside will resemble concrete block. The auditorium will be 40x52, with an inclined floor and will accommodate 500 people. The stage will be 20 feet deep by 40 feet wide.

The auditorium will be well ventilated and will be provided with all modern safety precautions, three exit doors being on each side with four doors in front. The structure is expected to be completed in about two months.

BRAND NEW HOUSE FOR ARGENTA.

J. W. Enlow opened his new picture theatre in the Mathews building, Argenta, Ark., September 20. The house is the largest in Argenta and is being patronized by the best citizens.

Mr. Enlow has taken special pains to see that the house should be up-to-date in every respect. All the seats are so arranged that there is no obstruction to cut off the view of any spectator. The house is equipped with two of the latest model machines, and a fireproof booth.

Looks Over Trade Conditions in New York—Says American Pictures Are Most Popular

Among those who registered as visitors at several of the Eastern licensed film manufacturers last week was Peter C. Naylor, of South Africa. Mr. Naylor, who is the London representative of Naylor & Preschner, owners and operators of the Tivoli Theatres at Johannesburgh, Germiston and Boksburgh, in the British South African colony, came to America to look over conditions generally, and to see if he could not do better here in the purchase of film than in London.

During a chat with a Film Index representative, Mr. Naylor explained that, although many picture shows are operating in South Africa, no film exchange exists there as yet. It is necessary for Messrs. Naylor & Preschner to purchase outright seven films weekly for their three houses. The program in each consists of three reels of pictures and one or two vaudeville acts, changed twice weekly. The pictures are then sublet to a few smaller houses, but the total number of houses in which each film is shown does not exceed half a dozen, so that each picture has to pay for itself in three weeks' time.

This is accomplished by the high rate of admission charged. The Tivoli Theatres charge a shilling for admission and what is equivalent in our money to 32 cents for a reserved seat. The colonists evidently do not consider this rate exorbitant, because the well-known mining city, with a population of 60,000, supports 17 such shows.

An interesting fact is that in Johannesburgh, a cosmopolitan city, where people of all races exist in large numbers, only Caucasions are admitted in all theatres save two built especially for the natives. Chinese, Japanese and blacks can attend only these two theatres.

Mr. Naylor expressed surprise at the old, rain-streak films run in so many American theatres. He said that nothing but the clearest, most perfect film could be run in Johannesburgh. The patrons demand it. On Fourteenth street, New York city, especially he found the films in very bad condition.

Regarding films, Mr. Naylor said that American pictures take better in Africa than the product of any other country. All purchasing of film is done in London at present, where the best product of the entire world are on exhibition and for sale.

E. N. DOWNS WILL GO TO BUFFALO.

Emery N. Downs, of Atlantic City, N. J., was seen on Broadway last week, shaking hands with his motion picture friends. Mr. Downs, who is the proprietor of the Criterion picture theatre, on the Boardwalk, at the famous Jersey summer resort, is now preparing to go to Buffalo, some time during October, to take charge of the new Plaza theatre that is in the course of construction.

The Plaza, says Mr. Downs, will be one of the finest equipped picture theatres in the Empire State. It will seat in the neighborhood of 800 persons. The houses will have two of the latest model picture machines and one of the latest improved screens.

Before going to Atlantic City, Mr. Downs was the manager of the Proctor-Sanderson picture theatre, on West Front street, Plainfield, N. J. From Plainfield he was sent to Perth Amboy, where he was manager of the Proctor house until he became proprietor of the Criterion at Atlantic City.

TIVOLI PICTURE THEATRE, JOHANNESBURG.

MOTION PICTURES FOR ASYLUM PATIENTS.

To amuse the patients in the Essex County Hospital for the Insane, Newark, N. J., the Hospital Committee of the Board of Freeholders have taken under advisement a proposition made by Warden Charles A. Steadman for a motion picture and vaudeville show. Representatives of an amusement company offered to put on shows at a cost of $35 each in the large amusement hall at the institution.

Dr. Guy Payne, the acting medical director, favored such a move as a benefit to the patients. At present the only entertainment afforded is paid for with money realized by fancy work and sewing done by the inmates.

MORE ESSANAY WESTERN PICTURES

Equipped for Long Tour with Special Car and Big Company the Essanay Promises Big Pictures in Near Future

AFTER two months' sojourn in the East, the Essanay Western Stock Company, now numbering 28 people, returned to Colorado last week for another season of picture making. An added feature to the already large equipment is an especially constructed railway car, equipped with developing tanks and drums and all facilities for developing new films, and for the transportation of the companies' properties and effects. The developing plant, it is believed, will be of great value as all the new films will be developed and tested before shipping East, thus saving considerable time at the Chicago factories. On its third trip West, the Essanay stock company numbers 28 people, and others are expected to join the company in Colorado. The first stop will be made at Morrison, Colorado, where the company operated last Spring before coming east, and after completing a number of films, the interior scenes of which were made in Chicago, the company will turn West and North, and work south as the winter closes in.

The Essanay Company's new negative car marks an epoch in the history of picture making in that it is the first specially constructed car for picture purposes. In fact, the car and its equipment forms a sub-studio and factory in itself. Besides the developing plant it carries a projecting machine and a negative finishing room. As the films are made and developed they will be tested on the projecting machine and any scenes not photographically perfect can be taken again, thus saving the time of waiting to hear from the Chicago factory where it was formerly necessary to develop the films. The car carries its own generating plant for the projecting machine and for the portable lights in taking interior scenes. It will also accommodate the automobiles, motor-cycles and camping equipment and all the properties and effects of the company. The car is 62 feet in length, painted a handsome dark olive green, with the name of the firm across the side. It is further decorated with two large brass mounted paintings of the Essanay trade mark, the Indian Head.

The new stock company, accompanying the Western producers this fall, numbers 28 people, including the members of the former company and the remainder of the Eastern Stock Company, while an entirely new company, under the direction of Mr. Harry McRae Webster, one of the foremost of American producers, will have charge of the Eastern studio. Hank and Lank, the inimitable comedy twins, will accompany the expedition for a short time and will soon be seen in new scenes and stunts. A number of very humorous scenarios concerning Hank and Lank as cowboys and tenderfeet, have been prepared and will make uproariously funny films. Mr. G. M. Anderson, the Western producer and manager of the Western Stock company, will be assisted by Mr. Arthur Mackley, formerly a dramatic producer with the Eastern company.

Besides the negative car there are many new facilities in the way of a larger and more convenient portable studio for the making of interior scenes. The new studio has been built expressly for the Western company and was designed for easy shipment and made so compact the entire framework, sides and canvas roof are easily compressed into a small space, making it possible for the company to move as frequently as they desire. This is found to be a decided advantage as the company has been nomadic and has had to follow the best weather and scenic conditions.

The Western company carries two large touring cars for transporting the people during a day of picture making. Also, there are location scouts, equipped with motorcycles and field glasses to find suitable locations for the scenes in the pictures. As it is sometimes necessary to cover long distances during a day of picture making this arrangement has proven a real time-saver.

It is the plans of the Western company, as soon as they have completed operations in Colorado, to work north and west into Montana and Wyoming. Since acquiring the railway car it is their intention to visit scenes formerly inaccessible because of the lack of hotel accommodations. Equipped with tents, and every facility for ideal camp life the company will visit the most remote and isolated points in the very heart of the Rockies. In this way they will obtain the most picturesque backgrounds which could be wished for.

Two new camera men, it is understood, will join the party at one of these mountain points and will be employed solely to obtain scenic pictures which will compare in beauty to the famous "Wonders of Nature" film, released by the Essanay Company a year ago. Much of the country in the neighborhood of Yellowstone Park and its vicinity has not been photographed and contains numberless magnificent scenes which will prove immensely pleasing to lovers of scenic America. At the present time the Essanay Company's special photographers are unusually busy in the scenic and industrial fields. A camera squad has just returned from the Yosemite Valley country and reports making some superb views. Another camera is in Nicaragua making pictures of the mammoth banana industry.

As the weather grows colder the Western Company will work west to the Pacific coast and south to Southern California. During the winter season they will visit points of interest in California and Mexico, probably making their headquarters at Santa Barbara, one of the Western cities, formerly visited while on their last tour. When the weather breaks in the early spring they will again work north, returning to Colorado where they will continue operating until the company disbands for the summer.

The Essanay Company is a pioneer in Western picture making and is the first to employ a special car in transporting its company to the actual scenes of the stories it pictures. Splendidly equipped for a long tour this last expedition forms a strong contrast in comparison to the first trip West when the company included but two or three people, a camera man and producer. But, it is due to Essanay enterprise that great things should grow from such small beginnings. The Essanay Western company is efficient in every department and will undoubtedly give us some magnificent pictures this fall and winter.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A LIE."—Billy Larkin is the proud possessor of a new car and he invites his friend Smith for a short spin in the country. With the promise to be home again within an hour or two, Smith enters the auto.

An hour later we find them stranded with a broken down car, twenty miles from home. Billy is no mechanic, and after laboring hopelessly with the intricate machinery of the balky machine gives up in despair and suggests that they look up lodgings for the night and catch the first train for the city in the morning.

At the little wayside inn Smith makes an effort to telephone his wife, but the phone is out of order. Smith and Billy suffer all the discomforts peculiar to "best" rooms in country hotels and sigh relievedly when they board the citybound train.

When poor Smith finally reaches home and endeavors to explain his nocturnal adventures to his skeptical wife, she refuses to believe the truth and takes refuge in a more conventional falsehood. He tells her he was called out of town on a business matter with Mr. Brown, of Pickletown. Later, when Mrs. Smith, still skeptical, is left alone, she wires the following to her husband's supposed friend at Pickletown: "Come at once and see me. Husband must not know."

After she leaves the room Smith enters with Larkin, who Mrs. Smith has never seen, and finds the blotter with the note to his imaginary country customer. Aware that Brown, of Pickletown, is a fictitious character, Smith urges Larkin to play Brown. Mrs. Smith returns and is introduced to "Brown," and is for the moment pacified.

Unfortunately Pickletown harbors a real Brown, who receives Mrs. Smith's message, and being somewhat of a country Lothario hurries into his best clothes and sets sail for the abode of his unexpected admirer. In his haste he leaves the telegram and his wife discovers the duplicity of her spouse.

Brown, of Pickletown, after some trouble with the butler, is ushered into the presence of Mrs. Smith. He presents his card and a large bouquet, and Mrs. Smith, confused by this, calls upon her husband for an explanation.

The real Brown is at once accused by them of being an impostor, and as he is unable to produce the telegram they hustle him out, and, threatening him with instant destruction, feel they have disposed of him.

But they have not reckoned with Mrs. Brown, of Pickletown, who arrives in search of her erring spouse. Here follows another confusing scene for Mrs. Smith. But Smith and Larkin bribe off the Browns and get them to swear they are both impostors.

The picture ends happily with the final ejection of the Browns and Mrs. Smith in her husband's arms.

"THE BEARDED BANDIT."—In the little Western town of Lariat, when our story opens, there is much excitement over the latest depredations of the robber who, because of his particular ingenuity in hiding his real identity, is styled the "Bearded Bandit." The name was evidently supplied from the fact that he wears a disguise in the form of a heavy black beard. The night before the bandit is reported to have held up a bunch of punchers and got away with a good quantity of dust. Something must be done to stop him, and therefore a posse is organized to accompany the sheriff on a little man-hunting expedition with a prize of $5,000 to the citizen who either bags or "plugs" the dare-devil robber.

Curt Wilson, the young sheriff, is in love with Nan Connors, the daughter of a neighboring ranchman, and it is partly to obtain the advice of his prospective father-in-law as well as to see Nan that he rides out to Connor's ranch before setting out on his perilous expedition.

He shows Nan and her father the notice stating that $5,000 reward will be given the man who captures the bearded bandit and asks Connor's consent to marry Nan immediately he captures the bad man. Connors winces, then rises and smilingly offers his hand. "It's a bargain," he says; then pleading an excuse to get away he leaves the two young people alone.

The next scenes show Connors riding up the mountain road, listening for the first faint rumbling of the wheels of the stage coach, which he knows is due at this time and which, he is also aware, carries an express box full of bullion.

Two hours later the little town of Lariat is again electrified by the news of the bearded bandit's holding up the stage coach. The sheriff and his posse hesitate no longer, but, swinging into their saddles, start in pursuit of the bandit. On their way they meet Connors, who has disposed of the swag and who even has the audacity to join the man-hunters in their search for the wily highwayman. Needless to say, the search is a failure and the disheartened sheriff and his posse return to town.

A few weeks go by and we find Connors and a few of his cronies at a friendly game of poker in the "Red Dog," Lariat's best bar and dance hall. During the game a young stranger, who has entered, is permitted to take a hand, but Connors finds him cheating and, drawing a gun, orders him out. The young fellow stalks angrily out, then turns on his heel and fires through the open door. Connors sinks in his chair, mortally wounded, but staggers to his feet and asks one of the boys to fetch his daughter.

Half an hour later Nan is at his side, and when they are alone Connors pulls from his breast the bearded bandit's outfit and begs Nan to use them in claiming her reward. Then death seizes him, and the girl falls weeping over her father's body. Rising again stoically, she seizes the black beard, the mask and other equipments and thrusts them into the stove just as the sheriff and the boys enter.

The "bearded bandit" was never captured.

"THE LITTLE ACROBAT."—A clown is giving a performance in the street. He has with him a small lad. The latter fails in trying to walk a tightrope and is rewarded by kicks and hard blows from the man. A marquis, only a boy of fourteen years, is among the crowd and steps forward with the intention of protecting the little acrobat, but it would have gone hard with both, if an Englishman had not stepped forward and knocked down the clown. The young noble takes the lad home and they live together good companions. Meanwhile the man, swearing revenge, plots to kidnap the marquis, and one night, with three companions, breaks into the house to carry out their intentions. They have, however, been seen and a rough welcome is extended to them, resulting in their being marched off for the punishment they richly deserve.

"HER FIANCE AND THE DOG."—A certain man is in doubt as to what to buy as a birthday present for his sweetheart. A great amount of thought is wasted on the subject, but at last the choice is made. He decides to buy her a small dog, similar to the one belonging to a mutual friend. She expresses a wish for just such a gift and very much wants to know what he has decided upon, but knowing women aright he is firm and refuses to tell her. This causes several pretty lover-like tiffs. At last, however, the animal is brought forward, and proves to be a very acceptable gift.

"THE DUNCE CAP."—Bob, one day at school, not having prepared his lesson, is punished by having to put on the donkey's hat and walk home. Upon reaching there, he is sent to his room to think over the enormity of his crime. Instead of doing that, however, he bravely resolves to run away, and with this object in view, he writes a short note to his parents stating his intention and then crawls out of the window. The film goes on to describe how he wandered on, gradually becoming more tired, and at last, in desperation, jumps into a cart which he finds by the wayside, the vehicle in the end bringing the hero home asleep. The parents discover his absence, rouse the household, send out a search party, but without result. However, when the wanderer drives up in the farmer's cart, he is received with tears by his overjoyed mother, and the donkey hat episode is forgotten.

"A SKIER TRAINING."—A short but interesting series, showing a pastime unfamiliar to most people of this country.

The views were taken at Chamoix, France, during the winter season. We see the French champion training and performing different jumps.

An excellent view is shown of the Chamoix valley as well as close views of the jumper, as bird-like, he appears seemingly from the clouds.

"THE DISHONEST STEWARD."—Lord H—— is obliged to leave for abroad where he is called on business. Before starting he leaves his little son and the mansion in the charge of his steward, who swears to take the son and conduct everything to the master's satisfaction.

After his departure, however, things take another turn. The steward proves to be a very authoritative and severe man. He cannot bear the sight of the child, to whom he makes existence a burden.

Soon, through a paper, he learns that during a very big storm the ship his master is in has been wrecked and everybody has perished, including Lord H——.

From that moment the unfaithful steward has but one thought—to rid himself of the child and appropriate the fortune he has in charge.

He takes the boy away one night and loses him in the wood, where he is afterward found crying and shivering by an old beggar. Both go to the police, who, after having heard the story of the child, order the well-known detective, Charlton, to investigate into the affair.

After a short search the detective discovers the old servant, who at once recognizes his young master and corroborates his story in every point. Charlton then decides to use a trick in order to bring the steward to confess his crime. He disguises as Lord H—— and holding the child by the hand appears before the steward, who at the sight falls on his knee and implores mercy.

His guiltiness established, he is arrested, to the great satisfaction of the others.

"CITY OF A HUNDRED MOSQUES, BROUSSA, ASIA MINOR."—A visit to Broussa, the city of 600 mosques, gives us a wonderful insight into Eastern life. It is a typical Turkish town, and its streets are full of sights unfamiliar to the European. The old Roman bridge, on which houses are built, is very like the old prints of London bridge a few hundred years ago. The inhabitants of Broussa take their pleasure in a fashion which would make the most adventurous traveler on scenic railways pause. The whirligig, which the Turk patronizes, is a very insecure great wheel, round which he is swung in the most exciting fashion. A giant hollow tree, through which a horse and cart can be driven, and a typical native belle smoking a hookah are among the other interesting subjects in this film, the scenes of which are always full of life and animation.

"A COLD STORAGE ROMANCE."—One would never give a simple little egg the credit of furnishing the material for a real romance. Nevertheless, stranger things have happened, and Samantha Higgins was thoroughly imbued with the romanticism characteristic of a blushing maid of seventeen summers. Hans

THE LAST OF THE SAXONS

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 7th

An Historical Drama Embodying the Love Story of King Harold of England and Lady Edith and the Battle of Hastings in All Its Details, Action and Grandeur.

BY WAY OF INTRODUCTION:—Harold, Duke of Wessex, second son of the powerful Earl of Godwine. He laid claim to the throne of England after the death of King Edward the Confessor in the year 1066, and succeeded to the kingdom. "William the Conqueror," the son of the Duke of Normandy, came to England, defeated Harold at the Battle of Hastings, in which Harold was killed and William took possession of England and was raised to the throne at Westminster on Christmas Day, 1066.

This ornate and magnificent picture, "THE LAST OF THE SAXONS," has to do with the betrothal of Harold to Lady Edith, one of the court attaches. This occurred when he was the "Duke of Wessex." After the death of King Edward and he was selected as ruler of the Kingdom he was obliged to break troth with Edith in order to sustain his relations with Edwin and Mocar and stand in with his allies. Therefore, he married the Princess Aldyth, although he did not love her, and always kept in communication with Edith, who was as much in love with him as he with her, as is evidenced at the gorgeous and unprecedented elaborate marriage ceremony at Westminster, where Edith is seen mournfully witnessing the wedding of her rival to her love, the King. Then, again, when she bids him farewell, just before he starts for the Battle of Hastings, and finally when she searches among the dead after the fatal encounter with William to find the body of Harold and expires of a broken heart when she discovers it.

RANSOMED: or, A Prisoner of War

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 4th

TAKING his departure from home, Captain Jack, of the Confederate army, leaves to rejoin his regiment, but before doing so promises his boy that he will return to celebrate the little fellow's fifth birthday.

One month later the Captain gets a leave of absence and goes back to keep faith with his son. The house is watched by Union soldiers. The birthday promise must be kept with little Ned. The father succeeds in getting to his family with the few presents which he has purchased to make the boy happy.

The furlough ended, the Captain must go back to the ranks. The question of getting safely through the Union lines is a puzzling one, the attempt to do so was arrested by the "Yankees" who make the Captain a prisoner.

Word must be sent to his wife; through the kindness of a guard, he writes a letter which he sends to his family. They are grieved and the wife gives way under the strain. Not so with little Ned. He proves himself to be made of sterner stuff and profits by the example of his father. He starts for the Union camp, approaches the General, tells him of his father's home-coming to celebrate his fifth birthday and how he was taken prisoner. The boy offers the General his little woolly lamb in exchange for his father's freedom.

The General is convinced from the boy's story that the Captain was not acting the part of a spy, and to humor the child accepts the woolly lamb and releases his father.

Shortly after the war is closed, and the General sends little Ned a fine rocking horse in exchange for the woolly lamb, which he has always kept and cherished in memory of the boy who loves his father.

The SAGE, the CHERUB and the WIDOW

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8th

Great! Simply Great! There's Some Fun to This, but Only Where It Comes Incidentally to the Rest of the Story—Altogether the Cherub Is a Match for the Sage, Who Finds the Widow a Very Attractive and Interesting Study.

WHEN you see it in the newspapers you know it is so. "Doctor Arnold, the noted specialist, has given up his practice and rented a cottage at Brightside, where he will pursue his literary studies and research." This is the notice that appeared in the columns of the home newspaper. We follow the Doctor to Brightside and learn all about "the Cherub and the Widow."

Doctor Arnold's cottage is the next one to the widow's, and while he is quietly pursuing his studies, the Widow's little girl looks over the dividing wall, and calls out to the Doctor. "The Sage" is very much annoyed. The childish playfulness and desire to make the Doctor's acquaintance gradually wins his friendship. One day the Widow misses her little girl and finds her sitting with the Sage having a jolly good time. Shortly after this episode the child is taken very sick, a specialist is called in by the attending physician and they retire to the garden to hold a consultation.

Doctor Arnold, in his accustomed place, overhears the discussion of the little one's case, acts upon the impulse of the moment, climbs over the wall and offers his services in behalf of his little friend. The physicians willingly accept his services. He makes a careful examination and diagnosis of the child's case, and after prescribing for her and watching her, she is soon on the road to recovery and in a short time is well.

The most interesting part of this story is the climax. The Doctor learns to love the Widow as well as the Cherub, and it is not long before things become still more interesting—we can guess the rest. The Sage marries the Widow and the Cherub is glad of it.

Hay, the neighboring farmer, makes love and ventures a proposal to Samantha, but it was not according to Laura Jean Libby's idea of love's romantic courtship that the young lady of seventeen glimmering years had been digesting. So he got the mitten, but Hans, remembering the old adage, "If at first you don't succeed," etc., at the first opportunity pops the question again with like results.

Samantha has too much foolishness on her mind to suit Daddy Higgins and is frequently reminded of the fact. During the packing of the eggs she conceives the idea of inscribing her autograph on one that is ready for the storage. In the meantime the undaunted Hans has enlisted the aid of Daddy Higgins in the pressing of his suit. Remembering what the knights in the novel did, she forced her admiring Hans to get on his knees to her.

An elapse of ten years and the innocent little egg had found its way to an aspiring poet's larder. By accident the poet finds the message and determines to investigate, not knowing that for ten years past the writer of that message had been Mrs. Hans Hay.

Hans was lazy and Samantha, still dreaming of Laura Jean, sets her food down hard and fires the stalwart defender of the home out and hustles the kids after him. Coincident with this move the poet arrives, following up his clue, confronts her with the egg, and Samantha at once strikes the old romantic chord, just as Hans enters and proceeds to extinguish the poet. The natural consequence—a family tete-a-tete—and just to think, it was all caused by an innocent little egg.

"MY FRIEND, THE DOCTOR."—A delightful little comedy that will bring loud and hearty laughter.

"FOR HER COUNTRY'S SAKE."—The play is located in a tavern near Valley Forge, when the British and the Colonial armies were both stationed in that section. A message is received by the tavernkeeper that Washington, in riding through, is planning to stop at this inn for a couple of hours' sleep. The innkeeper, with two accomplices, plan to kill Washington while he is sleeping in order to secure the £3,000 offered by the British government. The innkeeper's daughter, who is strongly loyal to the colonial cause, overhears the plan and resolves to save the life of the great general.

She hastens out to the stables, finds the hostler, and leading him to the top of a hill, pays him to stop Washington as he rides by that way. The daughter then returns to the inn. She stands by the window, anxiously watching out. Her father smokes his pipe by the fireplace and the two accomplices have retired through a door that stands ajar into an adjoining room. From time to time they peek in through the door or creep out cautiously and whisper in the tavernkeeper's ear. The hostler is not able to stay Washington, who is riding rapidly on horseback, so the girl sees him ride into the yard, and the next minute he appears in the room. He orders supper, which the daughter spreads for him on the table.

The scene changes to the hall of the inn, where a flight of stairs leads up, colonial fashion, showing two bedroom floors at the top. Washington is ascending the stairs, the daughter leading him. The father stands at the foot holding a lighted candle. He points out to the girl the door of the room in which he wishes the general to sleep. She opens it, bows, and Washington enters.

The play again shows the living room of the tavern. The father and his two friends are smoking and moving about it and the daughter is clearing away the table. She then goes over and kisses her father good-night, impressively, putting both hands on his shoulders and looking into his face. She bows good-night to the other two and leaves the room. At the top of the stairs she knocks softly at Washington's door. When he appears she asks him to lie down and rest in the next room. When the door closes on him she stands, with hand on heart, and then enters the room where those below believe him to be sleeping.

Downstairs the three men throw dice to decide who shall do the deed and the lot falls to the father, who picks up a dagger and leaves the room. In a minute he returns, flourishing the dripping dagger. The three pour out wine from a bottle that stands on the table, lift the glasses and click them, and are about to drink to their success. While they are doing this Washington enters. He crosses the room to them, opens his purse and lays a coin on the table; then leaves the room. They are too overcome by his appearance to move and stand speechless until he has left. The father, with a cry, then dashes from the room. In a minute he appears, carrying in his arms the lifeless form of his daughter.

"BILLY'S SISTER."—Full of booze, bluster and fight, "Black Pete," a big "bad man' of the wild West, comes from the local saloon ready to put daylight through anybody and everybody within the range of his voice and the reach of his gun, and, to further convince the crowd that he is the terror of the territory, lands on an inoffensive bystander, knocking him down.

"Billy' is an entirely different sort of a citizen; he is a young chap, living with his sister, whom he loves very dearly; their love is mutual. Billy has received a letter and stops on his way home in an opening in the woods to read it. While thus engaged, an Indian girl is making her way through the woods. "Black Pete," coming along the pass, sees and attacks her. "Billy" springs to her defense and knocks "Pete" down; in falling he strikes his head on a stone and is killed. In his haste to get away, "Billy" drops his letter.

Shortly after the death of "Black Pete" his body is found by some of his gang, who at the same time pick up "Billy's" letter, which readily connects him with the killing of "Pete." They decide to capture and lynch him. The Indian girl overhears their vow of vengeance and warns "Billy" and entreats him to escape.

He makes good his escape, tells his sister of the accident and the determination of the gang to lynch him. His sister, with a woman's quick wit, quickened by love and impending danger, tells him to take off his cowboy togs and put on his store clothes, mount her pony, catch the next train at the first railroad station and get away as quickly as possible. He loses no time in starting and is now on his way to reach the train.

His sister soon follows him dressed in his discarded outfit, her long hair turned up under the sombrero. She looks the counterpart of "Billy," the ranger; it is not surprising that the gang mistake her for "Billy" and give pursuit, exactly what she wanted them to do; by misleading them "Billy" has plenty of time and chance to make his "getaway."

You can talk about riding; better than "Billy's" sister never sat astride a horse. She leads the gang a long and rapid chase. There's a flash, a dash; it's a wild, exciting ride; whiz! whir! goes the lariat, and swish! it lands over the girl's shoulders, caught by the desperate men who pull her from her horse, drag her to a tree and throw the rope over a branch; but they fall back astounded when "Billy's" sister looks into their faces and shakes down her long brown hair and stands defiantly before them. They ask her what has become of her brother. She tells them he is further than they care to travel and a heap further beyond their reach. They release her and she goes back to her home, where she rewards her faithful horse with her caresses and gratitude for his part in the saving of "Billy."

PATHE FRERES.

"BETTY IS STILL AT HER OLD TRICKS."—Mad-

cap Betty purloins a big ball of string, and thus armed prepares innumerable traps for the peaceable inhabitants of the neighborhood. Bells are rung from a distance by means of a length of string, a stand full of crockery is fastened to the wheels of a motor car, and an old woman, deceived by an innocent-looking "lost" purse—which is mysteriously jerked away as she stoops to pick it up—causes the whole of the outside display of a fruit store to fall in hopeless confusion. Before long the whole district is in an uproar, and Betty finds it expedient to make herself scarce. A horse provides the means, and jumping upon its back, she gallops out into the open country, where she comes across a very human being looking scarecrow. In an incredibly short space of time she has jumped to the ground, has fastened it on the back of her patient steed, and has herself taken its place. She then spurs it on with a lash on its flanks, the horse gallops away, and it is not at all unnatural that Betty's pursuers in the distance should fail to recognize that it bears only a dummy figure. Even when they do capture the runaway horse their rage blinds them for a few minutes to the deception, and they pound away at the unoffending dummy, while Betty stands giggling at the scene a couple of fields away.

"MOLUCCA ISLANDS."—Prolific vegetation bordering the shores of the sacred pool, the pointed roofs of a village and the golden cupola and the minarets of a mosque are the noticeable things of interest in the first pictures. Then natives at work on the upkeep of the roads and a charming picture of the crossing of a ford are capital views, while industrial pursuits, such as weaving and the grinding of rice flour, have not been disregarded. Another very interesting scene is that showing the raising of water for irrigation purposes, while the film closes with the felling of a big tree in a virgin forest.

"MIRTH AND SORROW."—It is carnival day in Paris, but Bertha Colazzo, artiste at the Grand Opera House, is scarcely aware of the fact until she receives a letter. By it she learns that there is to be a matinee at the theatre that afternoon and that she must attend to take the part of one of the principals who will be absent. There is no joy in the news for her for her mother is lying at the point of death. But go she must, so donning her jacket, she leaves her mother to the care of a neighbor. The comic opera is in full swing when a hasty note is handed to Bertha in the wings of the theatre. Her mother is worse, and she must hurry back if she desires to see her once more. Without stopping to think, she throws a cloak around her shoulders and hastily leaves the theatre. Outside the streets are full of people. The carnival procession is passing, and revelers in fantastic costumes are tossing handfuls of confetti at each other. Bertha, still in her fancy stage costume, is taken for a merrymaker and showers of the variegated bits of paper are flung at her by three young men who pursue her to the very door of her poor room. Here, after a second's hesitation, they decide to enter, bearing with them the burdens of confetti and flowers, with which they purpose to bombard their victim. They push the door open and then stand shamefaced and silent at the sight which meets their gaze. In a room which tells a tale of poverty and pinching, the young girl whom they have just been pursuing lies sobbing on the floor by the bedside of her mother, dead before her daughter could reach her. For a few moments they look at each other, and then, not knowing how else to offer his sympathy, one takes the flowers, and, shaking off the confetti, lays them on the bed before silently withdrawing his companions.

"SLIPPERY JIM."—A phlegmatic pickpocket is arrested and taken to his cell. As he is an unusually wily customer, he is bound by fetters and chained to the wall. Speedily putting these off, he is locked up by the enraged warders in a chest, but escapes and is finally thrown into the river tied up in a sack. Coming up from the water again, perfectly dry and safe, he makes a bicycle for himself and rides off furiously, springing ultimately on to a passing train which bars his passage. In this way he is carried along on his bicycle for some distance, but reaching the river again he descends on his machine, performs a few evolutions in mid-air, the reflection of the bicycle showing up clearly on the face of the water, and then lands in a sumptuous room. The police follow, but are baffled by the continued disappearing tricks of the clever thief, who dissolves from view and reappears in the most unexpected of places. At last he is captured in the police station itself and carried once more to his cell, but crashes through the iron bars with little trouble, leaving his warders safely under lock and key.

"DIFFERENT TRADES IN BOMBAY."—A colored industrial. A series of interesting educational pictures carefully selected.

"A LIFE FOR LOVE."—The salient figure in the piece is Toine, the village idiot, in whose confused brain there has sprung up an undivided love for Nais, Farmer Micoulin's daughter. Nais is fresh and pretty, and when Frederick, the son of her father's landlord, comes to spend his vacation at the farm, the man and girl love each other with ardent passion. It is impossible, however, for some glimmering of the true state of affairs to escape Farmer Micoulin, and his first suspicions are confirmed, and there then germinates in the old man's cunning brain a plan to be avenged. He dare not openly attack his landlord's son, but a shot from behind when he and Frederick are out shooting alone will never be regarded as anything but an accident. So run the farmer's thoughts, but those of Nais keep pace with his, and she, suspicious of her own father, enlists Toine to keep watch over Frederick. Toine knows it is because she loves the city man, but although he suffers, he is faithful to his trust. The results are fatal, for one morning Nais and Frederick find the mangled body of the idiot and her father tightly locked together at the foot of a ravine. They have met, fought and gone over the precipice together.

"AN INDIAN'S GRATITUDE."—This is a story of early California in the fifties. Two prospectors, after many years of disappointment, have at last discovered gold in a river and are washing it out and hiding it near their rough and simple camp. Iron Horn, an Indian medicine man, one day comes across them, and, furtively watching, finds out their secret cache. He rides back to his tribe and tells them of the white men who are mining, but does not say that he knows where the valuable metal is secreted. The Indians ride up in the night and surprise the two unfortunate men. Binding them with stout ropes, they sling them across their horses and carry them back to their native encampment. The two prospectors refuse to disclose the hiding place of their find and one of them is severely tortured without result. Iron Hand is called to cure Lightfoot, the chief's son, who has fallen sick, but being unable to effect a cure, is placed under guard. As a last resort one of the prisoners is asked to aid, and under the white man's treatment the lad recovers. That night, while the camp is dark and the rest of the tribe are asleep, Iron Hand escapes and runs to the prospectors' deserted camp to obtain the booty. The other Indians soon miss him and follow on his trail. A lively chase ensues, part across wild virgin land, and part on water in canoes. Iron Hand obtains the gold and continues on his flight, but the Indians overtake him.

He turns round as they approach and stumbles and falls over a cliff 250 feet high. The Indians descend and find him dead. They take the bag of gold from his hand and return to their camp. Here they find Lightfoot entirely recovered, and in gratitude for this give the two prospectors their liberty and return to them their gold.

"THE ICONOCLAST."—Iconoclasm, the attacking of cherished beliefs and theories, has ever been the incitement of discontent, but the iconoclast of to-day may be better termed the socialist. Discontent is rather induced by selfishness, and selfishness is the seed of irrational socialism, nurtured mainly by laziness, and very often, drink. The principal character of this Biograph story is a lazy, drink-sotted printer. He must be urged by his poor suffering wife to leave his cups to go to work. As usual he arrives at the office late, and an argument between he and the foreman ensues, just as the proprietor of the establishment enters, escorting a party of his friends to show them about and introduce them to the mysteries of his printing plant. The sight of these people dressed in sables and silk is extremely odious to this disgruntled workman, and when the proprietor shows a spirit of cordiality, he, galled by the inequality of their stations, repels it, and with a show of anarchism attempts to strike his employer. For this he is discharged, but his wife begs him, for the sake of their children, to try to get his position back, which he endeavors to do, but in vain.. By this time he is ripe for anything, and drink-mad, sets about to take a fool's method of leveling ranks, that is, armed with a pistol he makes his way to his former employer's home to wreak revenge. We anticipate the printer's visit to the publisher's home by showing the publisher in the depths of despair over the intelligence that his little child, despite the endeavors of surgical experts, is an incurable cripple. This is the scene that greets the printer at his surreptitious entrance. He finds there are things that wealth cannot buy—health and strength. He steals through the portieres with pistol in hand, intending to satisfy his covetous grudge with the death of this heart-crushed father, who sits weeping for his poor child's misfortune. The little one realizes her father's despair and so tries to cheer him, showing how nicely she can walk with the aid of the leg supports. This fortitude of the child makes a stronger appeal than moral suasion, and he turns from his purpose. The publisher, however, sees him and recognizes him as his former employee, and reasoning that now is the turning point in the man's nature, detains him to persuade him to mend. The child's mediation causes him to view the world from a different angle. Things could be better with him if he wanted them so, hence his employer gives him another chance by reinstating him in his former position at his printing office.

"A GOLD NECKLACE."—This is a delightful comedy of errors, in which a gold necklace figures prominently. Mazie lends her necklace to Nellie, her guest. Nellis is asleep in a hammock when Sam, her sweetheart, arrives in his auto. He awakens Nellie with a kiss. As she starts up she drops the necklace in the grass and their efforts to find it prove futile. Sam promises to buy her one to replace it, thinking it was her own property. He has her minutely describe it that he may get an exact duplicate. Meanwhile, the governess has found the necklace and given it to its owner, Mazie, who is unknown to Sam. He sees it on Mazie's neck and after a chase insists on purchasing it. Mazie thinks him a lunatic and humors him, receiving a good price for the band. Nellie, upon receiving the necklace, restores it to Mazie. Sam meets Mazie again and sees the necklace again around her neck. This time he fancies she has stolen it and hurries to tell Nellie, but his valet takes more decided steps and recovers the gem by seizure. Mazie is flabergasted at first, and when she recovers her equanimity she rushes off for the village constable. He surprises Sam in the act of restoring the necklace to Nellie, who is also surprised. The participants of the episode are now assembled, and after the excitement has subsided, explanations and introductions bring peace.

"HOW HUBBY GOT A RAISE."—Leave it to wifey, she'll fix things for you. Her schemes are so subtle that there doesn't seem to be the slightest chance of her falling down. However, when Mrs. Knowit suggested a plan to her husband, Esra, by which his services would be the better appreciated by his employer, docile Esra had his doubts, yet dare not oppose. This plan was to invite his boss to dinner and give him the feed of his life. She argued that the way to reach a man's good nature was through his stomach. To Esra's surprise, the boss accepts the invitation with avidity. Esra telephones, what he feels, the ominous intelligence, and so wifey prepares. That she may make a great showing, she starts on a borrowing expedition. An evening dress from one of her neighbors, cut glass from another, silverware from the next, in fact, various sorts of furnishings, even a maid to wait at the table. Everything in readiness, she feels proud of the layout. Ezra and the boss appear, and dinner is at once served. The boss is rather suspicious as he regards the elegance with which his employee's dining room is fitted, and he indulges in a bit of mental calculations. Wifey is self-satisfied, for she fancies she has made a great hit. The boss upon leaving expresses himself as having enjoyed himself, but upon returning to the office he writes a note and dispatches one of his clerks to the Knowit domicile. Mrs. Knowit seizes the note, sure that it contains news of a boost. The note:—"Dear Sir: I can't have men in my employ who live beyond their income. You are discharged." Collapse of the Knowit family.

violent attempts to hit the ball and is banished to the field. Of course, the first ball that comes his way goes by him to the infinite disgust of his pupils and their remarks are of so unpleasant a nature that he puts on his coat and leaves the field, vowing never to help them again. And then comes the day of the great game, when the Home Team pits its strength against that of an amateur nine of an adjoining town. People flock past Bumptious' house, begging him to come and see the sport, but he is adament. He refuses to take any interest in the game in which such poor players as his critics are to have the leading role, for one of his critics is to pitch, another is to catch and another occupies third base. But when they have gone by, even the "Gum Chewing" girl, he weakens a little bit, looks longingly after them and finally putting on his hat, strolls off in that direction, though all the time pretending that he is not going to the game. He does go, however, and occupies a seat in the front row of the grand stand. We see the pleased anticipation of the faces around him contrasted with his own scornful look and then we turn our attention to the ball field itself, where the critics are at work. They face the fearsome pitcher and one after another they go down before his prowess and take their seats on the players' bench. Of course, this produces a very disconcerting and melancholy effect upon the "fans" in the grand stand around Bumptious and the contrast with his own evident satisfaction and even tumultuous joy over the downfall of his critics is something worth seeing. Then when the game is at a critical point and the home team take the field (there are three men on bases and the score is tied) then it is that the home pitcher throws his shoulder out of joint and has to leave the game. What can they do? There is no one able to pitch. Someone suggests Bumptious. It is the last resort, and although they hate to do it, they go in a committee to the grand stand and beg him to save the day for them. It takes a long time to persuade him, but finally he magniloquently agrees to help them out. The "populace" cheer him as he enters the field and he takes off his cap, bowing modestly and gracefully to them. In the pitcher's box he takes his stand, looks around the bases and prepares to pitch the game to a glorious finish. Suddenly, as he is about to pitch the first ball his attention is arrested. A troubled look comes over his face. He has evidently seen a hoodoo of some kind. And then we see that the "Gum Chewing" girl, the only unenthusiastic face in the grand stand, the only one that does not believe in him, has caught his attention at a critical moment. He fumbles with the ball, pitches it feebly and—it sails into space. We even see it soaring through the clouds miles away, while the base runners scamper around, scoring four runs and losing the game for the home team.

The execration of the fickle public on poor Bumptious' head is something terrible to behold and we see him scampering across the field as though pursued by legions of malevolent fiends.

Then he climbs through a hole in the fence, exhausted, out of breath and discouraged, and the final scene shows his hairbreadth escape from the crowd by climbing stealthily and ludicrously into his own kitchen window while they watch the front door.

Bumptious is always good fun, and in this picture he covers himself with glory as a funmaker if not as a pitcher. It is one of the freshest, happiest, jolliest of the Bumptious series and is certain to make new friends for our round little hero.

"MORE THAN HIS DUTY."—The Royal Northwest Mounted Police of Canada are conceded to be, without question, the bravest body of men in the world. When one of their members is sent out to capture a criminal he is not permitted to bring back any excuse whatsoever. Nothing but the actual criminal, dead or alive, can be the fruits of his return. They have no other choice except to be made prisoners themselves for neglect of duty. They have been known to travel hundreds of miles alone up into the frozen north for months, day after day, until they get their man. This body of men stands unique and alone in the annals of the world's criminal hunters, and the Edison company takes great pleasure in introducing them to the motion picture world in this strong, dramatic picture, "More Than His Duty," which has added charms from the fact that all the exterior scenes were taken in the exact location that the story depicts. In fact, some of the scenes were taken at the very home of the Superintendent of the Northwest Mounted Police of Regina, Canada.

The story deals with the Superintendent of the Royal Mounted Police, as they are sometimes called in Canada, and his spendthrift son and also his daughter, who is secretly in love with one of the Royal Mounted men, who has incurred the hatred of the son by boldly entering a Western gambling house and ordering the son out, which prevents him from becoming involved in deeper debt with a notorious gambler of that district. The Royal Mounted Police have absolute authority in this part of Canada, and, of course, the son has no means of redress for what he considers a humiliation; but by chance he discovers the sister's love for this man and he immediately informs his father of the fact. The Superintendent absolutely refuses his daughter any further communication with Morton, the Royal Mounted Policeman in question, due to the fact that the father does not consider him worthy of her hand, being only one of the rank and file of the Royal Mounted. After getting even with his sister's sweetheart the boy leaves for a hunting trip. Two weeks later news reaches the Superintendent of a desperate robbery committed at Banff at the local postoffice and he decides to give young Morton a chance to advance in his position and win his daughter's hand. Needless to say, the two lovers fully understand the opportunity that has been afforded them, and Morton sets out for Banff to capture the criminal. Shortly after his arrival he falls upon a clue to the robbery and starts out in hot pursuit, which terminates in a running fight and the wounding of the criminal in the arm. Imagine Morton's surprise and sorrow when he discovers the robber to be none other than the Superintendent's own son. To bring him back as a criminal means the disgrace of his sweetheart and her father. To fail means his own disgrace and the loss of the woman he loves. He chooses the latter course, however, and the son returns home and remains quiet, while Morton reports his failure, but fate intervenes and the daughter discovers her brother's guilt, and while Morton is trying to persuade her to keep the secret for her father's sake a shot is heard upstairs. The truth is soon revealed by the silent figure of the boy's lifeless body, while the heartbroken old Superintendent silently reaches for young Morton's hand and thanks him for his nobility and self-sacrifice in doing "More Than His Duty."

"THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER."—There is nothing so calculated to excite risibility as the sight of a practical joker who is made the victim of his own plot. This sort of a climax is the big laugh in the "Farmer's Daughter."

The young lady in question is admired by all of the young lads about the countryside who pay her constant court. Among them is a young chap, son of one of her neighbors, who becomes jealous of her other suitors and plans to prevent them from interfering with his lovemaking. The approach to the farmer's home is across a small stream, over which is thrown a log for a footpath. The young chap takes it into his head to soap the log at a certain point so that those crossing after him will be plunged into the creek. All goes well and our joyous young joker is having things pretty much his own way when one by one his rivals cross the log. It is impossible to describe the fun, but the witnessing of it is a series of laughs, one building up on the other. Finally, when our young friend, in the height of his delight at having outwitted his rivals, takes his leave of the farmer's daughter he is so overjoyed that in crossing the log he forgets the soap, with dire results. His enamorata witnesses his downfall and falls into a fit of laughter, in which any one who observes the film will heartily join

A pretty rural comedy, wholesome and uproarious.

"RANSOMED; OR, A PRISONER OF WAR."—Taking his departure from home, Captain Jack, of the Confederate army, leaves to rejoin his regiment, but before doing so promises his boy that he will return to celebrate the little fellow's fifth birthday.

One month later the Captain gets a leave of absence for three days and goes back to keep faith with his son. The house is watched by Union soldiers, and to enter it without being detected seems impossible. The birthday promise must be kept with little Ned, and after some reconnoitering the father succeeds in getting to his family with the few presents which he has purchased to make the boy happy and keep up the spirit of the occasion.

The furlough is ended and the Captain must go back to the ranks. The question of getting safely through by the Union lines is a puzzling one and in the attempt to do so was arrested by the "Yankees," who make the Captain a prisoner of war.

Word must be sent to his wife; it is accomplished through the kindness of a guard, who allows him to write a letter which he sends to the prisoner's family. They are grieved and the wife gives way under the strain and sorrow of it all. Not so with little Ned. He proves himself to be made of sterner stuff and profits by the example of his father. He starts for the Union camp, approaches the General and tells him of his father's home-coming to celebrate his fifth birthday and how he was taken prisoner when he was going back to his regiment. The boy then offers the General his little woolly lamb in exchange for his father's freedom.

The General is convinced from the boy's story that the Captain was not acting the part of a spy when captured, and to humor the child accepts the woolly lamb and releases his father.

Shortly after his release the war is closed, and the General sends little Ned a fine rocking horse in exchange for the woolly lamb, which he has always kept and cherished in memory of the boy who loves his father.

"THE LAST OF THE SAXONS."—By way of introduction: Harold, Duke of Wessex, second son of the powerful Earl of Godwine. He laid claim to the throne of England after the death of King Edward the Confessor in the year 1066, and succeeded to the kingdom. "William the Conqueror," the son of the Duke of Normandy, came to England, defeated Harold at the Battle of Hastings, in which Harold was killed and William took possession of England and was raised to the throne at Westminster on Christmas Day, 1066.

This ornate and magnificent picture, "The Last of the Saxons," has to do with the betrothal of Harold to Lady Edith, one of the court attaches. This occurred when he was the "Duke of Wessex." After the death of King Edward and he was selected as ruler of the kingdom he was obliged to break troth with Edith in order to sustain his relations with Edwin and Mocar and stand in with his allies. Therefore he married the Princess Aldyth, although he did not love her and always kept in communication with Edith, who was as much in love with him as he with her, as is evidenced at the gorgeous and unprecedented elaborate marriage ceremony at Westminster, where Edith is seen mournfully witnessing the wedding of her rival to her love, the king. Then, again, when she bids him farewell, just before he starts for the Battle of Hastings and finally when she searches among the dead after the fatal encounter with William to find the body of Harold and expires of a broken heart when she discovers it.

"THE SAGE, THE CHERUB AND THE WIDOW."—When you see it in the newspapers you know it is so. "Dr. Arnold, the noted specialist, has given up his practice and rented a cottage at Brightside, where he will pursue his literary studies and research." This is the notice that appeared in the local columns of the home newspaper. We will follow the doctor to Brightside and learn all about "the Cherub and the Widow."

Dr. Arnold's cottage is the next one to the widow's, and while he is quietly pursuing his studies, comfortably located under the shade of an overspreading tree, the widow's little girl looks over the dividing wall, calls out to the doctor. "The Sage" is very much annoyed by the interference. The childish playfulness and desire to make the doctor's acquaintance gradually wins his friendship. One day the widow misses her little girl, looks over the wall, and finds her sitting with the sage having a jolly good time. Shortly after this episode the child is taken very sick, a specialist is called in by the attending physician and they retire to the garden to hold a consultation.

Dr. Arnold, who is in his accustomed place on the other side of the wall, overhears the discussion of the little one's case, acts upon the impulse of the moment, climbs over the wall and offers his services in behalf of his little friend, whom he has learned to love. The physicians willingly accept his services and he is invited to the room of the sick child. He makes a careful examination and diagnosis of her case, and after prescribing for her and watching her, she is soon on the road to recovery and in a very short time is well and about her play as usual.

The most interesting part of this story is the climax. The doctor learns to love the widow as well as the cherub, and it is not long before things become still more interesting—who can guess the rest? The sage marries the widow and the cherub is glad of it.

"THE BAGGAGE SMASHER."—Celia Strafford is a romantic young girl, but she admires brawn and good looks more than she does a title. Her father, however, is not averse to being the father-in-law to a Baronet and he falls an easy victim to "Jimmy the Duke" when that adroit swindler presents himself as Lord Euclid. His wife passes as his sister, the Duchess of Lornemary, and it looks pretty soft for Jimmy, who is after the Strafford necklace, a wonderful collection of diamonds. The little heiress does not care for Jimmy from the start and she admires him less after John Bender, the baggagemaster's assistant, comes to her aid when ehe is attacked by a tramp after "Euclid" has taken to his heels. As soon as the tramp is down Jimmy comes back to the attack and seeks to claim the credit, but Celia will not have it that way and John is thanked. All he cares for is Celia's praise, and when they meet again the next day and she again thanks the stalwart baggage smasher he is transported to the seventh heaven of delight. There is a splendid foundation for a romance, but the sinister figure of Lord Euclid stands in the way. Jimmy, however, "makes his haul," but the detective thinks his face familiar and visits the rogues' gallery of the metropolis. There a finger print and a picture tell their tale and a warrant is sworn out. Through underground channels a warning comes to Jimmy and he makes his escape in his sister's trunk. The baggage smasher smashes the trunk and Jimmy is arrested. That leaves the coast clear for the happy union of Celia and the baggage smasher—but this is a story of real life and it ends differently.

"WOMAN'S VANITY."—The devotee of fashion having mastered the intricacies of the hobble skirt sought new modes to conquer and a Parisian dressmaker evolved the "hobble hoopskirt," a hobble skirt with the hoop skirt of our grandmothers, starting from just below the knees and flaring some fifteen feet in circumference. It was a wonderful creation and the girl's delight was unbounded when the soft tissues were removed to disclose the "creation."

Navigation proved somewhat difficult, but she was able to make her decorous progress through the streets all unconscious of the attention she was attracting until upon her arrival home she found half a dozen persistent swains in her train instead of on it. It was more than she had bargained for, and with tears of mortification in her eyes she threw the now detested garment out of the window. It was rescued by a negro, who took it home to his inamorata, and presently the delighted darky was strutting out to show herself in the wonderful structure with its fifteen-foot flounce. Some of the mashers who had seen the original owner fell in behind and the crowd was augmented by others until there were a dozen following. The stroll ended by the water, and when the self-satisfied wearer raised her veil the men all fell off the dock. A rippling little comedy on the same reel with "The Golf Fiend."

"THE GOLF FIEND."—The golf fiend, with his bag of sticks and bag of tricks, is a funny person, but Jones was funnier because he was a golf fiend without being much of a player, and he persisted in driving at a ball no matter whose property the gutta-percha object happened to be. The other players objected when the ardent Jones knocked their spheres o the tees, and passers-by objected when he knocked the balls into their eyes. It may be seen that Jones was not the most popular man on the links by a great deal, and the more he hung about the more he got himself disliked. On the street it was pretty much the same, and there were a lot of people who thought they would enjoy nothing quite so much as using Jones' head for a golf ball and a sledge hammer for a driver. It was not their fault that someone did not carry out this program, but Jones was a good runner and he managed to keep ahead of them until their tempers had cooled down somewhat and they were not quite so blodthirsty. At any rate, Jones does not play so much golf now and there is a reason. Give a look at the reason. On the same reel with "Woman's Vanity" and a fitting companion to that fast little comedy.

KALEM CO.

"THE ENGINEER'S SWEETHEART."—Following up their great success, "The Hero Engineer," the Kalem Company offer another real railroad picture, entitled "The Engineer's Sweetheart." As in the former instance, the Kalem Company has gone to a large expense in securing what would amount to practically the exclusive use of an entire small railroad system, and with clear tracks and all of the running stock of the road at their disposal the Kalem players were enabled to produce a drama of extraordinary realism.

The play opens with a pretty romance, showing how a young engineer becomes acquainted with an attractive girl living in a roadside cottage. The waved signals as the train passes by on its daily run lead to a love affair and a betrothal. It so happens that one of the engineer's gifts to his little sweetheart is a powerful telescope with which she is enabled to see his engine as it comes speeding up the distant valley. It so happens that one day there is a heavy shipment of bullion over the road and a band of crooks determine to gain possession of the gold by throwing a switch and wrecking the train. Through the telescope the girl sees them at work. Realizing she has not an instant to spare, she mounts a horse and makes a thrilling ride and saves the train and the life of her sweetheart.

It is needless to say that she is successful and that the robbers are circumvented and captured.

Pictures of this sort seem to have a tremendous drawing quality, as is shown by the fact that "The Hero Engineer" in a number of instances broke all records for paid admissions in prominent moving picture houses throughout the country, and in "The Engineer's Sweetheart" the Kalem Company promise fully as strong an attraction.

"BIG ELK'S TURN DOWN."—"Big Elk's Turn Down," the Kalem Company's release for Friday, Oct. 7, is based upon a situation which borders rather close to comedy, but because it is absolutely true to Indian life it works out into one of the strongest dramas the Kalem Company has yet produced.

Big Elk, a young Indian warrior, fancies a white girl, the daughter of a settler living on the border line. In his primitive view of the proper thing to do under the circumstances, he goes to the girl's father and makes an offer for her with skins and ponies. The offer is a very good one, and if the girl had been an Indian, it probably would have been accepted and that would have been the end of the story, but the white girl did not appreciate a wooing of that character and Big Elk was turned down most emphatically. When Big Elk decided that he could not buy the girl, he would have her anyway, and when a favorable opportunity occurred he gathered up the white maiden to the back of his pony and made off with her. How her father and her white sweetheart finally rescued her and how the girl finally became reconciled to the situation forms the strong dramatic situation of the story.

The photography and scenic environments make "Big Elk's Turn Down" a picture that will take a prominent place in the long list of Kalem Indian successes.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE FOR BRONX

Will Be the First Theatre in America to Be Built in Syrian Architecture

Syrian architecture will make its first appearance in the Western Hemisphere with the completion of the three-story playhouse to be erected on the north side of Longwood avenue, 170 feet east of Westchester avenue, New York City, by the Damascus Amusement Company. W. H. McElfatrick, architect, who was commissioned with the task of drawing the plans for the most original specimen of architecture in America and Europe, has incurred great expense in obtaining models for the work. As a result the theatre will be the most expensive motion picture house in existence.

R. G. Knowles, the Oriental lecturer, and Frederick Klein, of New York, compose the owning corporation. Mr. Knowles, who desired that the house harmonize in design with the subject matter of his lectures, is responsible for the adoption of the Syrian style. He is now traveling through Syria and India, sending home suggestions for the construction of the theatre.

The first difficulty encountered by the architect was to get some one thoroughly acquainted with the architecture of the Orient to aid him in the work. After months of searching he managed to secure the services of Alexander I. Finkle, pupil of Bozart and Pasquale, who was assistant architect in the construction of the Paris Opera House. The latter had specialized in Oriental design, and to this end had spent years traveling through the Holy Land and the adjacent countries.

He reproduced on canvas certain specimens of architecture, which he adjudged to be the most typically Syrian, and these he will impress into service in the construction of the new theatre. Foremost among these models is a picture of the main gate in the wall that surrounds Damascus. In style the entrance to the theatre will follow the lines of the ancient postern exactly.

In regard to the project Mr. Finkle said: "Strictly speaking, the design will be Indo-Syrian, a composite of the Indian and Syrian motif. In fact, Syrian architecture itself is a composite. Neo-Syrian architecture is of pure origin and dates back to almost prehistoric times, but it is barbarously simple and might be said to comprise four bare walls. With the importation of the Gothic and Moorish idea, however, Syrian architecture became more elaborate.

"But through all these centuries of improvement Syrian architecture still retains its one distinctive, and yet most primitive, characteristic. You will notice that all the embellishments on a structure built in this style look as though they had been added after the building proper was completed. For instance, the windows, which are all built in projections, resembling somewhat the modern bay windows, impress one with the idea that they have been added as an after-thought.

"This effect will be present in the new theatre, as well as the battlements in place of the modern cornice. It is safe to say that the Damascus Theatre will be the only structure of its kind in America or Europe.

A seating capacity of 1,200 will be provided for in the theatre. The interior design will be in keeping with that of the exterior. All the most brilliant primary colors—red, blue and yellow—will be employed in the color scheme. The background will be white. The cost of the theatre is estimated at about $80,000.

that when the capacity is more than 300, the theatre must have an 8 foot alley on each side of the structure and running through the entire depth, this being the law governing legitimate theatres. This, of course, would make the building too expensive.

Fifth street, between Walnut and Plum streets, can boast of several of the finest houses in the city. There can be found the Gaiety, with Harry Hart, manager, who also conducts the American on Walnut street; the Bijou, I. Lisbon, manager; the Lubin, the first important picture theatre erected in Cincinnati; the Colonial, Ed. Bernardi, manager; the Sun, George Nixon, manager, and the Victoria, I. Frankel, manager. The Royal theatre on Vine street, an illustration of which appeared in The Film Index of Sept. 24, is the newest first class picture house constructed.

Mr. Dresner, speaking of the licensed exhibitors of Cincinnati, stated that they demand a high class service, regardless of price. Most of the leading exhibitors have full confidence in pictures as a strong drawing entertainment by themselves, and they are opposed to the use of cheap vaudeville. "The straight picture houses are the ones that are best satisfied with the box office receipts," said Mr. Dresner emphatically.

Cincinnati has an Exhibitors and Renters' Association, meetings being held the second and last Wednesday of each month. Both licensed and "isdependent" exhibitors are members of the association. At these meetings there are discussions and suggestions for the betterment of the picture business. All suggestions are taken in order as made, and the meeting passes on them. The association has been productive of some very good results. In the first place the moving picture license was reduced from $300 per year to $150 per year, a big saving for the exhibitor. The exhibitors work in harmony and do not resort to unfair competition. At the present time they are engaged in working out a plan whereby a circuit can be formed for illustrated song singers, so that each house will have a change of singers each week. Furthermore, the association recently rented an office in the Royal Theatre building, 7th and Vine streets, where the secretary is busily engaged from 1 p. m. to 9 p. m. in assisting exhibitors to secure musicians, vocalists, picture machine operators, etc., on short notice. The exhibitor simply calls up the secretary, states his wants and is immediately provided with the required help.

The Magnetic Film Service Co. is enjoying a profitable business at present, Manager Dresner assured me. It attends to the wants of the greater number of Cincinnati exhibitors, the Pittsburgh Calcium Light & Film Co. also having a branch office there. Last year, about this time, the Magnetic was buying only 7 reels of the licensed product; now the exchange is purchasing 70 per cent. of the entire licensed output. Manager Dresner does not consider the "independents" as competitors; in fact he stated that, so far as his exchange is concerned, he did not know there was an "independent" exchange in existence, in Cincinnati.

Mr. Dresner informed me that his exchange had taken on quite a number of new customers within the last three months, and that a comparison of the number of customers now on the books, with that of the same date last year, shows an increase of 200 per cent., or three times as many.

Mr. Dresner prides himself on the introduction of the herald system of publicity among his customers. At a small cost, the exhibitor is furnished (well in advance of the release of a film) with a herald, on which is printed the name of his theatre, the date of presentation, and a full synopsis of the film subject. A careful distribution of these heralds in the homes, in the vicinity of the theatre, is followed by good results. Film manufacturers furnish the Magnetic with cuts to illustrate these heralds. Posters are used very liberally by Cincinnati exhibitors and everyone insists on getting them.

The Magnetic Film Service Co. never closes its offices. Day and night forces are always on hand to attend to customers, who can thus get what they want any hour they call.

MELIES KIDS IN "OUT FOR MISCHIEF"

Just kids—two ordinary, every-day, healthy, American kids—are the principal actors in Melies coming comedy "Out For Mischief." They are not particularly bad youngsters, nor are they what are ordinarily termed model children, but they have the attribute so characteristic of the American child—pent up energy that expends itself in the perpetration of mischievous pranks.

At the home of their parents there are visitors. Naturally this is the time the youngsters get busy, for it is the time they are least liable to be reprimanded. The first of their pranks is the "getting away" with a can of black paint with which they paint a moustache and goatee on the portrait of their grandmother, making her look more like a feudal baron than anything we can think of. The sudden growth of the beard dumfounds and puzzles the family, much to the delight of the kids, who, emboldened by the success of their first trick, try the next one on their parents' guests. These estimable gentlemen spend an afternoon in the park during which time they lay aside their hats. When they return home and again remove their hats, great is the consternation to find black bands on their foreheads—a la Grecian. The mysterious black paint has been placed as mysteriously on their sweatbands.

At the supper table comes the climax and with it the exposure, for in the soup is found mice and frogs. There is no longer any doubt as to the identity of the mischief makers, who both receive severe spankings from both parents and guests. But after all they had boards underneath their clothing and father never spoke truer than when he said "this hurts me more than it does you, my children."

"Out For Mischief" will be released Oct. 13.

Hardship of Proposed New Theatre Law.

Seventy-five owners and managers of family vaudeville theatres, in Chicago, met at the Great Northern Hotel Friday, Sept. 23, and formed the Chicago Family Theatre Managers' association. This organization is a plan of defense against a new building ordinance which threatens to wipe out the present type of family vaudeville houses in this city.

The ordinance which, at the very prospect of passage, has frightened the small theatre managers to a point of terror, provides that theatres of Class 4, which includes ninety per cent. of the houses now playing vaudeville at 10 and 20 cents, must each employ a policeman and a fireman at their own expense, itself a serious matter, but inconsequential as compared with the provision that prohibits movable scenery. Without changes of scenery the smaller houses will find it impossible to present the grade of vaudeville now being shown.

Scenery Must Be Stationary.

The specifications of the proposed law, which goes before the Council Committee on Buildings October 3, bars any scenery except two asbestos drops, three wings and four sky borders, all stationary. This would prevent 40 per cent. of the acts now playing the Chicago small time from appearing in the theatres and greatly diminish the effectiveness of all the others, except the acts that play before the olio curtain.

Inquiry by members of the building committee into theatre conditions awoke the managers to a realization of their danger, and investigation on their part revealed that the promoters of the ordinance are in deadly earnest and propose to push it to success, if necessary, by creating a public sentiment through an expose of needed reforms in the small houses.

The ordinance was drafted by Assistant Corporation Counsel William S. Stahl, as a revised building law to cover theatres of Class 4. In it theatrical scenery is closely defined, and includes such stringent limitations that even special "drops" for acts working on the stage aprons will be prohibited. The measure is built to run until January 1, 1915.

It provides, among other innovations, that no additional Class 4 theatres shall be constructed with seating capacity of more than 300, driving new theatres larger than that into Class 5, where steel curtains and other costly paraphernalia are required; that no theatres shall be maintained in frame buildings.

Stahl declares that thus far no objection has been sent to the Council against the passage of the ordinance, that none is anticipated, and that if any arises it will be fought on grounds of public policy and drastic safety requirements.

The theatre managers declare that the precautions are beyond necessity, and that the ordinance is promoted with an ulterior purpose seeking their injury; that they will appeal to the aldermen of their wards, and that they represent millions in capital and will present a solid front against the legislation.

A HIGH CLASS PICTURE HOUSE.

H. M. Thomas, owner of the Aladdin theatre, Springfield, Mo., was a recent visitor at the General Film Company's office at 77 South Clark street. He had glowing words to use in describing the condition of licensed business in his city, and particularly when speaking of the Aladdin and its patrons.

The Aladdin seats 500 people; it has an orchestra of eght pieces, costing $200 weekly, and makes a specialty of scenic and educational films. Melodrama is barred, but good comedy pictures are always welcomed. In forming a program, the aim is to include a drama, an educational and a comedy, as patrons have expressed themselves in favor of such bills. All the leading citizens and professional men in Springfield attend the Aladdin shows and 10 cents admission is charged and willingly paid. Clergymen are frequently in attendance and the standard of the programs is always kept up so as to appeal to everyone of culture and good taste.

The head of the department of English at the Normal School co-operates with Mr. Thomas, by having the latter present pictures from time to time that illustrates the course of study. "A Midsummer Night's Dream," for example, was recently presented. The same week Selig's Shriner film was run off for the benefit of the Shriners. The week following a benefit was given for the Episcopalian Church, and the week following that a benefit will be given to the Musicians' Union, when a symphony orchestra of nearly 100 pieces will be in attendance.

Mr. Thomas shows to about 8,000 people weekly. There is no stage in the Aladdin and no songs, illustrated or otherwise, are used. Just high class pictures and a first-class orchestra. And there is no kick at the 10c. price.

The Aladdin is fitted up in luxurious style. A retiring room for ladies, with a maid to look after the wraps, etc., has a Japanese effect, with Japanese lamps, mats, cosy corner, etc. It is not unusual to find as many as 30 autos waiting in front of the theatre.

The Aladdin uses more newspaper advertising space than the new legiitmate theatre, having a yearly contract for 6,000 inches.

There are three other licensed theatres in Springfield and three independent houses. The licensed theatres are all showing to fine business.

HODKINSON IN TOWN.

Among the recent callers at the office of The Film Index was Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Hodkinson, of Ogden, Utah, who came down to New York to do a little fall shopping. Mr. Hodkinson is deeply interested in the uplifting of the exhibition end of the picture business, and says that he is tempted to provide New York exhibitors with an example of a first-class picture show.

PICTURE SHOW FOR HOP PICKERS.

F. A. Proulx and William Neuert, of South Bend., Ind., have been induced to put up a motion picture show in a large hop field near Littell, Lewis county, which is owned by Herman Klaber. Mr. Klaber thinks it will be a paying proposition, as there will be about 1,000 hop pickers employed, and he also thinks that it will help him to keep his employes from becoming restless. He believes what a prominent millman said recently, that it is hard to get an American laborer more than a mile away from a motion picture show.

NEW THEATRE FOR HAMBURG, PA.

Work on the National theatre, Hamburg, Pa., has already commenced, and it is expected that the picture theatre will be ready in the course of a few months. The theatre will be one of the finest in that section of the state and will run only the best and latest films. Besides putting in a fireproof booth and a new machine, there will be added one of the latest picture screens. When completed the house will seat about 400 persons.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"WHEN A BOY FROM OLD NEW HAMPSHIRE LOVES A GIRL FROM TENNESSEE."—Words by William Cahalin and Robert Roden; music by J. Fred Helf; published by J. Fred. Helf Co., New York City. For this popular author's hit, Scott & Van Altena have produced a set of slides that contain besides many scenes of beautiful, sunny Tennessee, patriotic scenes that always please the majority of audiences.

"STOP! STOP! STOP!"—Words and music by Irving Berlin; published by Ted Snyder Co., New York City. Irving Berlin, author of "That Mesmerizing Mendelssohn Tune," has had some great hits lately and "Stop! Stop! Stop!" bids fair to outdo them all. The music is good and the words are a "scream." The slides suit the lyrics exactly. "Mushy" to be sure, but—so are the words. And, anyhow, that sort of thing goes good once in a while.

"JUST FOR A DEAR LITTLE GIRL."—Words by Thos. S. Allen; music by Jos. M. Daly; published by Daly Music Pub. Co., Boston. Why are we glad, why are we sad? Why are we brave, why do we slave? All because of girls, if we may believe the lyrics of this song. Who's looney now? Anyhow, Scott & Van Altena have given us a nice girl to look at in a set of slides that do their name justice in every way.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"OH, YOU DREAM."—By Jerome and Schwartz; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. When Jerome and Schwartz get their thinking caps on, something good is the result, and there is another success—'Nuff said. As for a set of novelty slides, this one cannot be beat. Every slide something new—some novel effect that has never been seen before, worked out with the unmistakable skill of Wheeler. If you want slides that will attract, and send your audience out with a feeling of admiration—get "hep" to this set. It's a winner.

"O-O-OHIO."—Words by A. Seymour Brown and Eddie Leonard; music by Nat D. Ayer; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. Another song which will add much to the popularity of songs published by this house. Eddie Leonard is well known to minstrel fame, and as he had a hand in the production of "O-O-Ohio," it must be good. Wheeler is one man who knows how to illustrate a love ballad without making those illustrations monotonous. This set is an example of his art.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"AMO."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham; published by Shapiro. This is an exquisitely beautiful love song with a tender, haunting melody such as is characteristic of all of the compositions of the versatile author of such world-famous hits as "You are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Roses bring Dreams of You," "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-Night," etc. Simpson has made a set of slides that do full justice to this song. The models are a dark-eyed senorita and her toreodor lover in the national costumes of Spain. The scenery is typically Spanish, with rich and glorious tropical coloring.

"MY OLD LADY."—Lyric by Vincent P. Bryan; music by Gus Edwards, composer of "Schooldays," and "Sunbonnet Sue"; published by Gus Edwards, who is making such a sensational hit with this truly meritorious ballad in the "Gus Edwards' Revue" at Hammerstein's Victoria Theatre this week. This is a mother song and one of the most beautiful ballads ever written. The slides are remarkable for their beauty, coloring and artistic merit. They are the standard of excellence which Simpson always requires. This set is one of his best.

Levi Company.

"WILL YOU LOVE ME WHEN THE HONEYMOON IS OVER."—Words by Al. Bryan; music by Fred Fischer, writers of "Any Little Girl That's a Nice Little Girl is the Right Little Girl for Me;" published by Shapiro. A great novelty song ,with a catchy melody that will be heard everywhere. Slides are almost all novelties.

"COME, JOSEPHINE, IN MY FLYING MACHINE."—Words by Al. Bryan; music by Fred. Fischer. This is an airship song that should make a big hit. The slides fit the song to perfection and contain some very original novelties.

THE QUESTION OF DISPLAY.

The announcement on another page of this issue by the B. B. Sign Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, will no doubt attract considerable interest throughout the country.

With its recent reported increase in population, Cleveland seems to have jumped to the front in motion picture advertising. With the A. B. C. Co.'s "true to the film posters" and the 12 ft. display banners of the B. B. Sign Co., Cleveland can safely be called headquarters in picture theatre display advertising.

The B. B. Sign Co. which has been practically in control of Cleveland's theatrical work for a year past, has been for months preparing the innovation outlined in their advertisement. They are making up 12 ft. banners for all releases on specially prepared sign cloth as soon as the information can be obtained from the various manufacturers.

They are attractive signs which can be mailed or shipped with the films at a price so low that small circuits or exchanges now serving their customers with signs will do well to get into touch with this firm.

Their force of experts stand ready to give suggestions as to lobby or front display and catchy copy for signs at any time upon request.

They announce a catalogue in course of preparation which will be ready for distribution at an early date, showing any kind of a sign that a theatre could possibly use.

PICTURE MEN MUST PAY $500 TAX

Recorder Weir, of Montreal, Quebec, found nineteen motion picture men guilty, Sept. 1, of refusing to pay the $500 tax imposed by the city, and he imposed a fine of $20 each on the defendants, aggregating $380.

The cases had been before the Courts since last May, the legal dispute centering around the words of the by-law stating that the tax must be paid by the "owners of halls for the exhibition of moving pictures."

Three trial judges rendered no judgment on the merits of three important legal points raised by the picture men.

When the case was fought first by N. K. Laflamme, K. C., Judge Bazin dismissed the complaints against the men, saying that the wording of the by-law regarding the schedule of prices to be paid for picture shows could not be interpreted otherwise than that the owners of the immovables were responsible and not the lessees.

Some time after that first judgment, Judge Davidson of the Superior Court refused a petition to attack the by-law in that Court, saying that the points raised by the petitioners were unsustainable. Recorder DuPuis in the Recorder's court followed with a judgment in favor of the city on the obvious intent of the by-law, and yesterday Mr. Recorder Weir founded his judgment on the intent of the by-law, as shown by a clause that had hitherto not been brought into the argument, clearly proving, in his opinion that the intention was to make the lessees pay the tax.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

Proper Music for Motion Pictures and How to Play It

Clyde Martin is one of the few pianists in the country making a speciality of playing for motion pictures. He is at present filling an engagement at Dodge's theatre, Keokuk, Iowa, and while on a short trip to New York last week consented to write a series of articles on "The Proper Music for Motion Pictures," for The Film Index. The articles will no doubt be a great help to musicians in the picture business.

NO. 1.—THE MANAGER.

He was a shrewd (?) man. The clothing business was too slow and he had been fortunate enough to lay away a few thousand just about the time the call of the motion pictures began to ring in his ears. He figured; a nice front, a screen, a box office, and the public would do the rest. So Mr. Narrowmind secured an excellent location in the heart of the business district and spent a liberal amount on a handsome front. He secured the best machine and the best of everything for decorations, then came the salary list.

He wanted an attractive girl at the window. Many applied who would work for three dollars a week, but the one he wanted demanded ten dollars. Then came the doorman. Now, it kept him awake nights thinking of some popular fellow that could give everyone the glad hand. The man he decided on, just the fellow to his notions, would have laughted if he had been offered six dollars a week for the job, so he figured it money well spent to pay him fourteen. Then came the difficulty that ninety out of every hundred exhibitors experience before opening; the salary list was too large and the seating capacity too small; the same old story. Get a cheap piano player and singer.

Well, to make a long story short, the house opened and everyone in the neighborhood was willing to take a chance, once. The house was packed, the pictures were fine, but there was something lacking, something that gave the audience an uneasy feeling that made them restless. Mr. Narrowmind stood in the lobby as the crowd passed out, he heard several knocks, he could not understand. Charlotte de Luxe in the box office certainly looked good to the passers-by, and A. La Mode certainly gave everyone the glad hand as they let loose of the pasteboards, but, still the knocks continued night after night until some friend finally suggested a new piano player.

"What! a new piano player†" He only had to pay this one six dollars a week, and the way business was falling off he would have to get a cheaper one.

This can be applied to nine out of every ten exhibitors to-day. I have found that the average exhibitor regards the piano player as a fill in, or something to break the monotony. It grieves me to make this statement, but the average piano player is worse than something to break the monotony, he makes the show monotonous. It is not their fault, it is the fault of the manager, because he pays them such a small salary that they have no heart to work for his interests. They do not care whether the picture is comedy or drama, they are paid a "rag time salary" and it's "rag time music" the manager gets.

I know a great many managers who buy every new appliance for their machines; have installed the new screens and spend any amount of money to improve the picture, and still they employ a cheap piano player, who is worse than none at all. They do not take into consideration that the music makes the picture, and if they hope to make "picture fans" out of their audience, they should furnish the proper music with the pictures.

How many picture shows have you been in and heard some piano player playing a slow waltz through a comedy, or rag time through some dramatic scene? As soon as the exhibitor wakes up and insists upon his piano player following the pictures, and will pay him the right salary for the same, he will soon realize why his theatre has been a losing proposition in the past. The manufacturers are daily striving to better their productions and place pictures on a higher standard, the exhibitor should do his share.

In my next article I will give the piano players some tips that will be helpful to them in their work, and make them more valuable to the exhibitor, thus, bettering the salary question.

WHEELING HOUSES DOING WELL.

Picture shows in Wheeling, W. Va., promise to continue all winter though not so numerous as in the summer season. The Grand is running an exclusive picture house, while the Court is running pictures on the off nights and getting good crowds. The regular picture houses are all sprucing up and it is expected that they will get a good business. C. A. Young of South Wheeling, is arranging to reopen his theatorium which has been closed during the summer. Another new house is to be opened in Benwood, W. Va. The Star at Bridgeport was recently reopened for the winter, as was an additional house in Martins Ferry. John Papolous who operates the Lyric and Dreamland houses in Wheeling will open a first class house in Wellsburg.

WOMAN'S VANITY

A stunning dress as the feature of an excruciatingly funny story. There are a thousand feet of fun in the half length reel and the dress is an absolute novelty. Funnier than the hobble skirt and less hackneyed.

THE GOLF FIEND

The golf fiend developed the habit very suddenly and to make up for lost time he practised on the street or wherever he chanced to be. The ball did not always fly straight to the imaginary hole but it managed to hit something.

All good subjects are not Lubins, but all Lubins are good subjects

Released Monday, October 10. Length about 990 feet.

The Clown and the Minister

A story of stage life that is convincingly real. The hotel in a mining town was no place for a baby and the minister took the sick child and its parents into his own home. There the crisis of the disease came and the child slept in her father's arms. To rouse it meant the death of the child, yet the clown was urgently needed at the theatre where the cowboys and miners were clamoring for his appearance and to gain time the minister takes his place.

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

THE CENSORS AND THE CRUSADE

By Epes Winthrop Sargent

TO the newspaper man who also knows motion pictures this poor effort of the New York World to create an interest that will react in favor of the circulation department through an abusive attack upon motion picture theatres is a most lamentable display of imbecility. It would be silly were it not that right or wrong the printed word carries its effect and these lurid outbursts carry conviction in some quarters.

With few exceptions newspaper editors are always looking for some feature that will get the paper talked about, that will hold the circulation already gained and add to the number of papers distributed. There is small profit from the "paper sale" direct. No publication can exist on the sale of the paper alone unless an unreasonable price is demanded, but the greater the circulation the higher the advertising rates for advertisers pay a rate based upon "per thousand of circulation."

In some instances, such as free ice and fresh air excursion schemes the results are for the good of the community, but it frequently happens that a crusade is merely the excuse for the printing of obscene and metricious statements that pander to the demands of a certain class. This does not apply so much to The World as to other publications, but in the present instance The World is conducting a crusade against the pictures without even taking the trouble to assign to the matter a reporter who has been advised as to he conditions of the business and he is attacking the Censorship apparently to gratify the personal spite of its informant and the licensed pictures because the informant is a member of the so-called independents.

Many of the pictures which have furnished the material for these journalistic outbursts never were passed by the Censors either because they are relics of several years ago or because they belong to a modern output which the manufacturers dare not submit to any sort of censorship.

The Philadelphia North American and the other publications which use that paper's Sunday supplement, carried a couple of weeks ago an article on the censors in which a careful editor first made certain of his facts and the point of the story was the fact that this rigid censorship was based upon the voluntary submission of the manufacturers to the decrees of an almost self-constituted body.

And therein lies the strength of the present Censorship. It is not an enforced supervision with any show of legal authority. It is a combination between the representatives of certain welfare bodies and the decent manufacturers looking to the improvement in the tone of motion pictures. The very fact that the old pictures are found offensive while the present product of the licensed manufacturer is found comparatively free from offense even to The World. The manufacturers and censors are working together to raise the standard of the pictures, increase their moral tone and make them even better suited to the taste of a general public, and it is precisely because they are working together that they make advancement.

Were there to be a censorship established either by the local police or the State authorities it is certain that political favorites would be appointed, men as utterly unfitted for their work as some of the present local censors and it is not necessary to go into details concerning these. It would cease to be a labor of love and become a matter of pull and graft that would entirely defeat the object aimed at.

At present few films are heavily censored because the editors of the various production departments have grown careful through previous experiences and their aim is not to see how close they can come to the deadline but to see how far from it they can get. They have their stories censored before production is made when they feel uncertain as to the propriety of a scene or theme, they do not take chances on a story and then try to argue it through because they know they cannot "slip a bill" to the censors and get the story passed.

The method of censorship does not please The World, but the committee is not censoring film to please the Park Row editors. It is a National Censorship, too liberal to please the narrow-minded, too narrow-minded to please those who demand blood and thunder, but just and restrained in its judgment and representative of the taste of the great body of citizens who are neither prigs nor degenerates. They are not made drunken by a sense of power to ruthlessly destroy because they have the power. They are trying to make the films conform to a standard of merit and to lead production toward a still higher artistic plane.

But the censors need no apologist. Their work speaks for itself in the betterment of the present production of censored film as compared with the work of those manufacturers who dare not submit their film to the body.

And The World deserves no apologist. Modern newspaper methods are in greater need of censorship, particularly in New York where it is almost impossible to obtain the conviction of a woman who kills a man because juries, keenly aware of the agitation being raised will not bring in a verdict displeasing to the violent dailies. She at once becomes young, innocent and beautiful, though she may be none of these. It is not that the papers care whether or not an electrical current puts an end to an evil life. The sob sisters find readers for their columns of slush and that is good for the circulation department. It is the same way with the present crusade. The World does not care what damage is being wrought—if any—by the picture theatres, but it does care that for a couple of weeks the picture crusade is good for a couple of columns of "hot stuff" each day and "hot stuff" is good for the circulation.

To those behind the scenes The World's preachment against the sensational in motion pictures is almost as genuinely funny as Hearst preaching civic duty to others with his Congressional record behind him, not to mention other facts.

ESSANAY STAFF REORGANIZED

New Talent in Studio and Plant Will Effect Great Improvement.

Many changes have been made in both the studio and plant staff of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company during the past two weeks, which cannot but greatly benefit the release made by this firm.

The Production Department at the big Chicago studio is in the hands of Harry McCrea Webster, Stage Director well known both East and West, is a man of unusual originality and ability in the theatrical world. An entire new Stock Company has also been enlisted and productions will shortly prove that no mistake has been made in this direction.

Numerous other employees of the studio were also released and better people have been engaged to fill their positions. The printing, developing and mechanical departments also shared in a general change that cannot be otherwise than highly beneficial to the weekly output of this firm.

The management also states that their Western Company has been largely increased, and is in personal charge of Mr. G. M. Anderson and under his direction working in Colorado at the present time, making some very excellent subjects which are shortly to be released.

Under these new conditions a marked and decided improvement in the popular Essanay subjects will be observed, and the exhibitor and public will thereby benefit.

CASUAL COMMENT

WE will only comment "casually" upon the cover which adorns this number of The Film Index; further comments will be left to our readers whom we consider to be more impartial critics of such things. The cover, by the way, has come to stay and, if our modest opinion may be expressed at this time, we would say that it is "some class." At that it is only in keeping with the body of the paper, which has already gained the reputation of being the best appearing publication in the picture trade. These facts should appeal to readers and advertisers alike. There is a lot in the way things are served, and our effort is to serve both news and advertising in the most attractive form.

Attention is called to the increase in price for single copies; ten cents will be charged hereafter instead of five. There will be no increase in the cost of a yearly subscription; that will remain at $2 as before. It is a great value for the money.

HERE'S to the new name, "Photoplay." That's the word which has been discovered by the Essanay Company after a period of exploration extending from August 1st to September 1st and to all parts of the civilized world, and will hereafter be used by all discriminating persons to designate the finest all around entertainment in the world: the Motion Picture. The Film Index agrees with the finding of the judges that the word is both expressive and convenient.

According to the Essanay reports there were over 2,500 names proposed and, from some of the suggestions, it is plain that some of the contributors did some hard thinking. Here are a few of the freaks which the contest developed: "Actorlifeograph," "Pleasurepictoritis," "Motionphotogallery," "Picturestusojoy," "Essanayograph," not to speak of others. The best indication was the general interest shown in the contest—evidence that the "Photoplay" has a great and growing audience.

The Essanay Company is to be congratulated upon the successful termination of the contest and it may count The Film Index among the pluggers for the "Photoplay."

SPEAKING of Essanay, Mr. George K. Spoor, president of that company, writes that the company's staff in studio and factory has been reorganized and that the work of making Essanay Photoplays is going on just as though nothing had happened. Better men have been engaged to take the places of those who were dismissed or who left the employ of Essanay, and Mr. Spoor expresses the belief that there will be a marked improvement in the future product of the company.

It stands to reason that this must be the result. The Essanay Company has established a reputation from which it can never be separated. Men may come and go in its employ, but there is an intangible something that will always remain, and it is that something that is so potent for the success of Essanay.

Therefore, the attempt of a number of former employees of the Essanay Company to trade upon the reputation of the Essanay product, will fail utterly. Not only will they fail to produce good pictures, but they will fail to find a market for whatever they do produce. Working under the direction of the Essanay Company, and in the atmosphere of success that prevaded the Essanay studios, those employees were able to produce good results. Removed from those influences to a field that is marked by numerous failures; that holds out no promise to new enterprise in its already over-crowded ranks, theirs is now a hopeless undertaking.

Under different circumstances these misguided workmen might become objects of sympathy when adversity overtakes them; but their purpose to embarrass the concern that taught them what they know about the picture business, and to trade upon its good name, places them quite outside the pale. They deserve the fate that is certain to be their lot. They have accomplished nothing but their own undoing.

SIGNIFICANT is the fact that the Bijou theatre of Bangor, Me., in which W. E. Green the independent exchange man of Boston is interested, has discarded the independent service on account of the poor class of pictures supplied, and is now receiving the service of the General Film Company. According to our correspondent competition was so strong in Bangor that the only way the Bijou could hold its patronage was to keep pace with the other theatres. It catered to a good class of patrons who would not stand for the line of junk called "independent" film, and the management was given to understand an improvement must be made. Green did the best he could to satisfy the people with the "independent" stuff, but finally gave up and "licensed" service was installed. The house is now doing its share of the business.

IN this number of The Film Index will be found an excellent article from the pen of Epes Winthrop Sargent on "The Censors and the Crusade," meaning the recent attempt of The New York World to discredit the work of the National Board of Censorship and the character of photoplays which come under its scrutiny. Mr. Sargent points out the difference between the voluntary censorship now in force and the so-called censorships established by law and ordinance, usually in charge of local police authorities.

The nature of the crusade of The World is well understood by Mr. Sargent, who is familiar with the ways of the Park Row editors and their campaigns of sensationalism. The flat fizzle of the crusade in question is evidence that it did not meet approval of even the purists, neither did it help the circulation of The World.

TURN ON THE LIGHT

On several occasions The Film Index has called attention to the advisability of lighting the auditoriums of picture theatres. The simple solution of the problem is to turn on the light instead of turning it out. This can be done if your curtain is a Simpson Solar Screen. A large number of Simpson screens have been installed within the past few months and are doing all that is claimed for them.

With such an excellent device at such a reasonable price there can no longer be the least excuse for a dark house, except it be that the manager seeks to attract to his place of amusement the vicious and the degenerate and make possible the commission of crime such as has been laid at the door of the picture theatre.

We hope no reader of The Film Index belongs to that class; so, get a Simpson Solar Screen and turn on the light.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

MORE REVIVAL SUGGESTIONS.

Elwood, Ind., Sept. 8, 1910.

Editor Film Indev, New York:

Dear Sir—I have been much interested in the lists of old subjects submitted by exhibitors in reply to your article in The Index of Aug. 20.

Here are a few of the many good subjects we have shown and which we would like to see reproduced:

Napoleon subjects, Vitagraph.
Legend of the Ghost, Pathe.
Red Man and the Child, Biograph.
Paul Revere's Ride, Edison.
Osler Joe, Biograph.
Stirring Days in Old Virginia, Selig.
Four Wise Men, Selig.

I beg to differ with some of the exhibitors who are asking for new copies of old subjects. I feel that each and every licensed manufacturer can safely take some of their old subjects and with the wonderful improvement in acting and photography produce subjects that will please far better than some of their present releases.

I also notice that there is a demand for more comedies. By all means let us have more comedy, but no reproductions, as the majority of comedies released two years ago, were "jokes" instead of comedies. Respectfully yours, R. J. WEBER.

WANTS 'EM PRINTED ON ONE SIDE.

I wish you would advocate the single-sheet description of the subjects issued by the manufacturers. I am not to get posters with each reel, so employ a sign writer. He often makes use of the Kalem, Melies and Lubin circulars, but as they are often printed on both sides we cannot use the whole description. If the film manufacturers would issue a description, size 12 by 18 inches, printed on one side, we could use them on our billboards and the patrons would read these and understand the pictures much better. Yours, George D. Stevens, Manager Grand Theatre, Torrington, Conn.

FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH.

Haverhill, Mass., Sept. 28, 1910.

Film Index Pub. Co., New York City, N. Y.:

Sirs—Quite often one reads in the trade papers of the need of new ideas for motion pictures, and as one very much interested in the game, I would like to suggest to the manufacturers the production of some of the following:

AN EXHIBITION OF POOL PLAYING.—One of the many experts with the cue could give an exhibition that would cover half a reel and not be other than of intense interest, not alone to those who play the game, but, too, to hose who would marvel at his wonderful control of the cue ball.

WRESTLING.—Two professional wrestlers could demonstrate the many holds, grips, etc., closing with a good, showy match.

STAGE MAKE-UP.—Showing how the stage people make-up for different characters. There could be a wealth of comedy worked into something of this kind.

A FOOTBALL STORY.—We have had football stories, but none that I have seen have shown real scenes of the game itself. Why not? That would be the real strength of the story.

FIREWORKS.—Sometime ago I saw a short reel of fireworks made by Pathe, but there wasn't much to it. Why not have some of these elaborate set pieces and have the film colored.

AMATEUR NIGHT AT A THEATRE.—There was one of these made some time ago, but not near as funny as it could be made. Many theatres run amateurs once a week and pack the house, and a good funny picture of this kind by some of the licensed manufacturers would make a big hit.

These are only a few suggestions. I could go on and give a hundred, but these few will give an idea of what a manufacturer could turn out and be sure of scoring a bull's-eye. "The Indian's Gratitude," "Nellie's Hatpin," and such titles are all right, but there is nothing that one can get out and cry about. What we want is something that will catch the interest of the people, something that will make them say, "Gee, here's something new." Respectfully,

W. E. FURBER, Mgr.

HAS NOVEL LIGHTING SCHEME.

Columbus, Ohio, Sept. 24, 1910.

Editor Film Index, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York:

Gentlemen—Having been a constant reader of your paper for several years, I have always taken quite an interest in the discussion of lighted houses during performances. Have seen numerous suggestions, but none that were satisfactory.

Have just remodeled my house, and have installed a system of lighting which is absolutely perfect, and has been pronounced so by all who have seen it.

My only real competitor, Mr. Max Stearn, who is also a particular friend, wanted me to have the idea patented, which I don't think is possible. I would not do so if I could, as I would like to see all who can adopt the idea. Will try and give an idea of how system is installed.

My room is 122 feet 6 inches from machine to screen, divided by seven plaster beams 15 feet 1 inch apart. Have placed eight 8-c. p. clear finger lamps, with half round shade, on four beams nearest entrance to theatre, which makes it possible to see every one of 429 seats in the house at all times without affecting picture one iota. Lights are placed on side of beam facing screen, and are invisible to audience.

The latch string is out to any exhibitor who wishes to call and inspect the results of this system of lighting. Very truly yours, C. H. BROCKETT.

GOVERNMENT INSTALLING EDISON MACHINES.

The Theatre Film Supply Company of Birmingham, Ala., recently installed an Edison Underwriter's Model "B" in Fort Dade, near Tampa, Fla., for the benefit of the soldiers in that garrison. This fort is located on one of the extreme keys near Tampa, and the place is so lonely that the only people seen by the soldiers on duty there are the lighthouse keeper and his family; so that the motion pictures will prove very welcome and entertaining to them.

A Model "B" was also installed recently by the General Film Company, of Boston, Mass., on the U. S. S. New Hampshire, the order for the machine having been placed by Rev. W. G. Cassard, chaplain U. S. N. The "jackies" get a lot of pleasure and entertainment out of motion pictures, especially when on a long cruise, and the thoughtfulness of their superiors in providing them with so attractive and at the same time instructive a form of amusement will undoubtedly be thoroughly appreciated by them.

An Edison Model "B" was installed a short time ago by the Howard Moving Picture Company, of Boston, Mass., in the Post Exchange, Marine Officers' School, Port Royal, S. C.

"PHOTOPLAY" WINS IN ESSANAY CONTEST

Edgar Strakosch, Exhibitor, Sacramento, Cal., the Author.

OUT of more than 2,500 names submitted to the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company in their new name contest, the purpose of which was to obtain a new name for the entertainment and the exhibition places where motion pictures are shown, the name selected by Judges George Kleine, Fred. C. Aiken and Aaron Jones, is PHOTOPLAY. The successful contributor of the word is Mr. Edgar Strakosch, a well known exhibitor in Sacramento, Cal. The termination of the contest has proven several things. From the great number of names submitted, it is evident that the contest aroused unusual interest, and aside from the liberal prize offered, is further proof that the exhibitors and public were of one mind in their belief that a more suitable appelative is needed. In the selection of "Photoplay" the judges have undoubtedly chosen wisely, and, though the name may not completely describe the motion picture entertainment, it contains a sufficiency of description, is happily euphonious, simple and easy to remember.

The following letter addressed to the Essanay Company from Judges Kleine, Aiken and Jones, fully explains the reasons why they have selected PHOTOPLAY:

Essanay Film Mfg. Co., 435 N. Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.:

Gentlemen—After careful consideration of the list of words submitted us by you from which we were to select a name which would be descriptive of the entertainment given in motion picture theatres, we have selected the word "Photoplay" as being more closely descriptive and more easily assimilated by the general public than any other of the long list submitted.

While the word is not entirely satisfactory, considering every phase of the question, we were influenced in our selection by the necessity of adopting a term which would be easily remembered, descriptive in character, simple and appropriate.

The word "Photoplay" seemed to us to have better chances of adoption by the public than combinations of more abstruse or technical terms, such as "Kino," "Graph," "Drome," "Cine," etc. One may speak of "going to the Photoplay," or "seeing the Photoplay," as the public speaks of "going to the opera," or "hearing the opera," these expressions conveying immediately an accurate idea of the character of the performance.

Many of the names submitted show ingenuity and industry, and you are to be congratulated upon the great interest which your contest has aroused. Very truly yours,

(Signed) GEORGE KLEINE,
F. C. AIKEN,
AARON JONES.

In the selection of the name Photoplay the Essanay judges made mention of several other names which were exceptionally good, among which are Kinorama, Photodrama, Photodrome, etc. There were three other contributions of the word Photoplay, which were rejected, however, in that the contest terms stated that the first contribution of the prize-winning word would receive $100. These contributors are Charles E. Inslee, New York City, contribution received Aug. 26; Henry Phillips, Milwaukee, Wis., contribution received Aug. 29, and Kirk Meadowcroft, New York City, contribution received, Aug. 29. Mr. Strakosch's word was received Aug. 17.

Immediately the judges returned their decision a telegram was sent to Mr. Strakosch, and the following interesting letter was later received:

Sept. 29, 1910.

Contest Editor, 435 N. Clark street, Chicago, Ill.:

Dear Sir—Your wire dated Sept. 29 was received with surprise and pleasure. I am sending with this mail my photograph as per your request. In regard to data, I wish to say that I have been connected with the moving picture business since Aug. 26, 1907, when I opened Dreamland, which at that time was the handsomest moving picture house on the coast. In December of the same year I opened the Bijou, and in October, 1908, Wonderland. Prior to 1906 I was connected with leading theatrical enterprises in the East.

I wish to congratulate your firm on the excellence of their pictures and subjects, not only from the point of photography, but also from the dramatic and comic quality. They are always clean and wholesome.

Wishing you all the success, I am,

Very truly yours,

(Signed) EDGAR STRAKOSCH.

Already the Essanay Company have received letters from exhibitors who intend adopting the new name. Mr. Aaron Jones, one of the judges in the Essanay Contest, and also one of Chicago's leading exhibitors, announces his intention of naming his new theatre on Fifty-first street just now in the course of construction, the PHOTOPLAY THEATRE and will use the name in all advertising for this theatre.

Mr. C. H. Kerr, who with Martin E. Johnson, of Independence, Kansas, are the proprietors of the three "Snark" Shows intend to use the name on a new house, soon to be completed for this firm. The three Snark theatres in Independence are named in honor of 45-foot boat in which Mr. Johnson crossed the Pacific and cruised two years in the South Sea Islands with Jack London.

Many other exhibitors will use the new name as an advertising feature and announce their intentions of "playing it to the limit."

The Essanay Company in forthcoming issues of the Essanay Guide will offer exhibitors many helpful hints and suggestions as how to popularize the new name.

BAXTER MORTON OFF TO EUROPE.

Baxter Morton, vice-president and general manager of the Nicholas Powers Company sailed for Europe Wednesday, Oct. 5, on the Cunard liner "Campania." He is off solely on a business trip, for due to the rapid growth of the Nicholas Powers Company's European business, it was thought necessary to establish agencies in that territory. Mr. Morton will study the needs of the various countries and personally plan the best methods of exploiting the Powers Cameragraph No. 6, already well known among the largest exhibitors on the continent. It is expected that Mr. Morton will be gone several months.

THREE NEW HOUSES FOR WARREN.

Three motion picture theatres were opened in Warren, R. I., last week. Each house is of the up-to-date order, and rivalry for the commanding business will be keen all during the season, and the Warren patrons expect to see some great shows before the springtime opens.

In two of the houses vaudeville will be shown and the prices will be above that of the straight picture theatre. The houses are absolutely fireproof, and one has a stage large enough to accommodate large musical and dramatic attractions.

The people of Warren are much elated over the fact that their town is ahead of Bristol in the show business, and that it means many of the Bristol people will come to Warren this winter to patronize the Warren theatres.

POSTERS NOW FOR SONGS.

An innovation that is bound to meet with the approval of almost every exhibitor was inaugurated last week. One sheet lithograph posters are now to be be given to the renters of song slides illustrating the songs of Jerome H. Remick, publishers, New York City.

This innovation has been brought about through the energy of De Witt C. Wheeler, the big song slide maker and the enterprising spirit of the Jerome H. Remick Company. It has long been contended by song slide makers that posters were in great demand and were as essential to a motion picture theatre as were the posters illustrating the films. That the song slide makers were right in their contention is proved by the fact that Mr. Wheeler has been overflowed with requests for these posters. For the benefit of those who do not know, we will say that these posters are sent to the film exchanges and song slide exchanges who buy slides of De Witt C. Wheeler, illustrating the songs of Jerome H. Remick, and can be had free of charge by exhibitors.

A KALEM CHARACTER PLAY

Study in Southern Types

REFERENCE to the illustration which accompanies this story reveals the excellent character portrayals for which this Kalem subject, entitled "For a Woman's Honor," is noteworthy. The story of the picture is that of a young lawyer of the Southern type who has incurred the enmity of the father of the girl he hopes to marry; having bested him in a lawsuit. The young folks decide to override the parental judgment by eloping and start to carry out their plans. The young man and the girl are presumably on their way to the minister's house when they discover the aged housekeeper of the village miller sitting on her doorstep in great pain.

Jumping from his horse the young man assists the woman to the extent of binding his monogramed handkerchief about her head, and then goes about his business.

Eventually the woman dies of her injuries and the old miller finds her body on the doorstep when he returns home. The sheriff is called and the handkerchief is found that points to the young lawyer as the cause of the woman's death. He is apprehended and placed on trial, with the old lawyer and father of his fiancee actively interested in his conviction.

There would have been no difficulty in explaining matters in the young man's favor if the proposed elopement had been carried out. But the girl repented of her decision and returned home, which action required that the night's escapade be concealed for the sake of the girl's reputation. Consequently when the young man was asked to testify in his own behalf he refused to say a word that would reflect upon the girl. Matters might have gone badly with him if the girl had not learned of the trial and rushed to her lover's rescue.

These events have been dramatically portrayed by the Kalem players, and their good work is enhanced by the excellent scenic effects which have been worked into the picture by the producer.

NAYLOR SAILS FOR HOME.

After spending three delightful weeks in New York City, Mr. Peter C. Naylor, the Johannesburg exhibitor, sailed for London on the White Star liner "Oceanic," last Wednesday afternoon.

During the time Mr. Naylor was in this city he visited many of the best picture houses and expressed a favorable opinion of all that he saw. Mr. Naylor was much impressed with the Lincoln Square theatre, and claims that Manager Fuqerson and Assistant Manager Bradt certainly knew how to run an up-to-date house. He was also interested in the airdomes he visited.

WILL RUN TWO HOUSES THIS WINTER.

M. S. Bennett, manager of the Belford Airdrome, at 642 Second street, Brooklyn, N. Y., closed that house for the season last Tuesday, and has moved into the Casino at Kent and Franklin avenues. The house, which seats 299 persons, is modernly equipped in every respect, and patrons, who visited the airdome last summer will find the same class of pictures at the new house. Mr. Bennett will also run the motion picture house on Bedford avenue, between Myrtle and Willoughby streets. This house also seats 299 persons.

PICTURE HOUSES SHOULD BE LIGHTED

Best Houses in France and England Find It Most Profitable—Would Stop Many Complaints

That the motion picture houses in this country should be properly lighted is claimed by Mr. John Collier, secretary of the National Censorship Board, to be, perhaps, the most difficult problem that now confronts the members of the Censoring Board. Mr. Collier, during his recent travels in England and France, where he made a special study of the lighting systems used by managers of both in and out-of-door theatres, received the impression that if the same system was employed in this country there would be no cause for adverse comment from either the general public or the Censorship Board.

In the English picture theatres and airdromes it is always light enough for one to distinguish his neighbor on the other side of the house. The airdromes are practically as light as day and the method of showing the pictures, while very simple, makes them really clearer than if shown in a darkened room.

At the Bourge Bouiller, Paris, where open-air performances are shown three afternoons a week, the system employed is perhaps the most novel as well as practical. The screen upon which the picture is thrown is encased by a funnel-like hood that extends out from the screen about twenty feet. The inside of this hood is covered with a black cloth, thus causing a contrast that gives the picture the proper effect.

The lighting of the indoor theatres is entirely by means of diffused light. The object is to screen the light so that no direct rays will fall either in the eyes of the audience or upon the screen. The most simple manner to do this is to have all lights attached to the ceiling of the house. The lights are screened by a hood and the reflection is then cast on the white painted ceiling, giving an equal diffusion of light to all parts of the house. This does not interfere with the picture's brilliancy. It also makes the interior of the houses light enough to see throughout the audience and removes any glare that might hurt the eyes. This is the principal thing that the theatre manager has to consider.

For some time in this country physicians and oculists have claimed that motion pictures have greatly affected the eyes of the theatre-going public, and after making a study of the real cause, they claim it is not from the flicker of the picture, but the bad light that is found in the theatres that injures the eye.

Mr. Collier also claims that dark houses bring two out of every three complaints that are made regarding the conduct of picture houses; and that as long as houses can so easily be made light and at such a slight expense, he thinks the American exhibitor should take advantage of what is being done on the other side and do likewise.

FAMOUS OLD THEATRE RUNS PICTURES.

The Belvedere Hall, Cumberland's oldest theatre, Cumberland, Md., closed as a playhouse for more than a score of years, was reopened September 24, as a motion picture and vaudeville house by Fisher. It has in recent years been used as a business college. In the old playhouse Mary Anderson, the elder Jefferson and many players of renown, now dead and gone, starred, from shortly after the Civil War until the old playhouse was colsed following the erection of the City Hall.

O'LEARY & O'NEIL BUY LYRIC THEATRE.

Gilbert Edwards has sold the Lyric theatre, Northampton, Mass., to James O'Neil and William O'Leary, who will transform the house into a motion picture theatre. The house is one of the best known in Northampton and should make an excellent place for motion pictures.

Both are practical picture men, having been in the business for the past three years. Mr. O'Leary was the operator of the Lyric prior to its closing down last spring. Mr. O'Neil was, for a long time, connected with Cook's theatre.

PATHE KEEPING UP THE PACE

Forthcoming Productions of American Company Interesting Subjects

"OUTWITTED" and "The Mystery of Lonely Gulch" are the titles of two Pathe American productions that will be received with interest. "Outwitted" is a plain tale of a new man put in charge of a force of workmen who is waylaid by a jealous member of the gang in an attempt to steal the weekly payroll. The plot is discovered and frustrated by the girl in the case, who takes the money from the new foreman and gets away in safety while he has a finish fight with the plotter. The picture reveals good photography and action.

"The Mystery of Lonely Gulch."

In "The Mystery of Lonely Gulch" there is a real mystery which must be left for the reader to discover when he sees the picture. The principals are a wealthy ranch owner, his new wife, an actor and the sheriff. The actor arrives in the little Western town and treats the ranchmen at the hotel to some lightning character changes. Later the old ranch owner and his young bride arrives. The bride proves to be the sweetheart of the actor and they put up a job on the husband. The trick to get the old man's money is a clever one, but the sheriff is clever, too, and penetrates the disguise of the actor, defeating his plans and sending both him and the woman accomplice on their way. It is the sort of photoplay that holds attention.

A SPECTACULAR DISPLAY

Peoples Amusement Company Feature an American Pathe Subject to Good Effect

Pathe Freres have kindly supplied The Film Index with a letter from Melvin G. Winstock, General Manager of the Peoples Amusement Company of Portland, Ore., describing the manner in which that company featured the Pathe American subject, "The Cheyenne Brave" at the Star theatre, Portland, together with a photograph of the display described. The letter and photograph are reproduced herewith:

We desire to congratulate you particularly on the artistic beauty and photographic perfection and thrilling interest embodied in "The Cheyenne Brave." Immediately upon its arrival we were convinced of its magnificent possibilities and we employed a scenic artist to paint a splendid picture, a photograph of which we will send you under separate cover, and placed the same across the front of the Star theatre in this city. The picture itself was fifty by eighteen feet. We not only had this elaborately painted as a "bally-hoo," but the painting contained a practical waterfall, a practical moon, and we had the picture so arranged that across the river and apparently going through the river there was a canoe—a fac simile of the canoe in the picture—containing the Indian brave and his bride. We can state without exaggeration that fully one hundred thousand people witnessed this interesting outside exhibition, and the result was that "The Cheyenne Brave" proved a tremendous box-office winner.

Our company always seizes every advantage to exploit pictures of this kind, and we have had in every single instance substantial financial recognition by reason of this original advertising. We have heard it urged that this spectacular advertising might possibly work against drawing the better class of the community. We have not found this to be true, as at all of our theatres in this city we have cultivated the real picture "fan" and our patrons consist of the most intelligent and appreciative people of the community, and the same people who go to the Orpheum and the Klaw & Erlanger productions visit our first run theatres and consider that they have missed something when they fail to see every first run picture exhibited.

While the foregoing is a fine commendation for the picture, it also illustrates what a resourceful manager can do in the way of publicity now and then when a suitable subject is offered.

SPECTACULAR DISPLAY AT STAR THEATRE, PORTLAND, ORE.

WELLS & ORPHEUM COMPANY OPEN MORE HOUSES.

The Wells Amusement company and the Orpheum Amusement company, which has its headquarters in Louisville, Ky., have added three new houses to the circuit. The houses are the Wells Bijou motion picture theatre, of Nashville, Tenn.; Orpheum, of Birmingham, Ala.; and the Lyric theatre, of Chattanooga, Tenn. All the houses will present five first-class acts of vaudeville together with first reels of motion pictures.

Since the two companies have combined, business has greatly improved; the patrons have a chance to see the best there is in both lines of amusement and it adds much to the standard of the different houses on the circuit. Irvin C. Simon is manager, with headquarters in Louisville, where the company runs the Hopkins theatre.

Homer Everitt has purchased the Nickelet at Stroudsburg, Pa., from Bert Palmer, and will conduct the same kind of a show that has been run by the former proprietor. In the spring several new improvements will be made.

"A Mohawk's Way" and "The Sepoy's Wife" were well received at the White City theatre, Pueblo, Col., last week.

IN THE CANADIAN ALPS

Edison Comedy with a Rocky Mountain Background — The Three Captains Again

UNDER the title "The Swiss Guide," a story of the Canadian Alps, the Edison Company have prepared for early issue a subject which presents some startling views of the Rocky Mountains of Canada. The Alpine touch is given by the guide who pilots the party of tourists up the mountains and over glaciers 10,000 feet above sea level. A bit of comedy is injected which gives added interest to the wild mountain scenery and furnishes the suggestion of a tragedy which is well within the imagination.

It comes about by the Swiss guide falling in love with one of the fair tourists and buys a pair of gloves as an evidence of his affection. On an excursion into the mountain wilds the guide declares his love for the girl and is promptly and severely repulsed. The girl runs away and is soon lost amid the snow and ice, and, to make matters worse, she falls and hurts her ankle so that she is unable to proceed further. While the girl is lying helpless on the ice her absence has been noted at the hotel and the guide's dog, a collie, is sent out to find her. He succeeds and the girl fastens her glove to his collar and sends him back for help. The guide's wife recognizes the glove because she saw it once before and it has been the cause of soreness of heart to her; but she goes to the rescue and brings the girl safely back to the hotel. Of course the guide is badly disturbed over the outcome of his affair, but he comes back home and there is an affectionate reconciliation.

SCENE FROM "THE SWISS GUIDE."

HIS BREACH OF DISCIPLINE.

In that international affair of the corset, "The Great Secret," the Edison Company introduced three captains as special sleuths of the Secret Service. Evidently these characters looked good to the producers, for they have come back on another similar mission in the forthcoming subject, "His Breach of Discipline," a pictured version of one of Roy Norton's stories.

The tale begins with a quarrel between a young officer of the French army and his superior. The latter has insulted an actress with whom the former is in love. A duel follows, in which the young man's superior is left for dead. To escape the consequences of his insubordination the young officer bids his sweetheart a quick farewell and makes his way to a California mining camp. Later the girl joins him and they are married on sight.

By chance some one recognizes the fugitive and word is sent back to France. The old general in charge of the Secret Service calls in his three captains and sends them after the fugitive officer, who is subsequently brought back to face the music. He bravely faces the old general, expecting to be punished for his crime, but there is a happy surprise in store. The duel did not result fatally and the young officer's antagonist lived to fight other battles and die of honorable wounds in Algeria. Before he died he confessed that he was to blame for the duel and that the young officer deserved exoneration.

This is what the chief of the Secret Service gives him and congratulations are passed around. The girl is there, and she surprises the old general by a generous kiss on either cheek, much to his delight.

Other coming Edison photoplays include two topical subjects, "The Riders of the Plains," which gives a glimpse of the life and work of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and "The Boy Scouts," a picture of the camp life of the boys under the direction of Ernest Thompson Seaton and Dan Beard at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y. A third subject, and the one calculated to arouse the most interest, is entitled "The Key of Life," in which the principal role is portrayed by Mlle. Pilar Morin, already well known to admirers of Edison subjects.

In this picture the Buddist theory of re-incarnation is the theme. The favorite pupil of a priest of Budda is given the mystic robe and the book of life by the dying priest. Later he tries it on the cat, which changes to a beautiful woman. Unfortunately the woman retains all the cat's instincts. This is not intended as an insinuation, but is a serious proposition, and the cause of it has his own time with the reincarnated woman with whom he is inclined to fall in love.

SCENE FROM "THE KEY OF LIFE."

But in arousing love in this strange creature's breast, he also manages to stir up some jealousy and the woman reverts back to the cat.

The subject affords an excellent opportunity for Pilar Morin to display her pantomimic ability, which she does with infinite grace. The photographic effects are equally good.

MELIES' "UNCLE JIM"

A Comedy Drama in Which He Who Waits Wins

Self-control is perhaps the greatest attribute a man can have. It makes rich men of the poor and masters of men of the clever. To the ordinary man it usually brings happiness and prosperity.

Jim, hero of Melies' coming release "Uncle Jim," is an ordinary man, who practices self-control. When Bill, his partner in the mine and his best friend, married the girl whose hand they were both trying to win, he didn't go up in the air, get drunk, and be a continual failure ever after that. On the contrary, he stuck around and became the trusted friend and confident of the happy couple. As soon as the offspring of this happy union was able to talk, it just sort of naturally happened that she called her daddy's dear friend "Uncle Jim."

But it would seem that when we are either too happy or too sorrowful Fate takes a hand and alters conditions. It happened in this case at any rate, for in a terrible explosion in the mine Jim's friend and his wife's father were killed, which sad event left the once happy wife dependent on her own labors to obtain the necessities of life for herself and child.

Jim, the ever faithful, was still a true friend. He brought playthings for the child and more than once proposed marriage—if not in words, at least in lingering looks. But the widow was never ready to consent. She held to the old idea that a woman must be true to a dead man, and who would believe that it was her own child that changed her frame of mind eventually? How the girl's honest, childlike affection for dear, old Jim, who had been so kind to her, made two hearts happy can only be appreciated by seeing this Melies' life study.

"Uncle Jim" will be released Oct. 20.

MONTREAL NEWS.

During the past week matters of utmost momentous importance to the local exhibitors have occurred. First and foremost amongst these, is the decision rendered by the Court of Appeal upholding the validity of the Province of Quebec to enforce a statute which, in the opinion of the plaintiffs, the motion picture exhibitors, is purely a matter of Federal jurisdiction. Accordingly M. P. houses may be legally prohibited from giving performances on Sundays; but as the plaintiffs have appealed to the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada to further decide on this knotty question, the exhibitors in consequence will be able to continue to keep open Sundays without any police interference. The new $500 license is also being contested before the courts and a decision is awaited for very eagerly.

The Jeffries-Johnson pictures are causing some friction out here. Summonses have been issued against local exhibitors for having made use of these pictures, but as the judges of the police court are somewhat puzzled to know to what extent these pictures are legally immoral, they have taken the cases in deliberation to look up further authorities.

A company incorporated with a capital of $100,000 has ben launched in this city. Its name is "The Canadian Amusement Co., Limited," at the head of which as President is William Bell, assisted by D. Zarafonites, Vice-President, and D. A. Murray, as Secretary-Treasurer. Their first new M. P. house in this city is the "Moulin Rouge," which has a seating capacity of 950, and since its inauguration a fortnight ago has been catering to large audiences. With the aid of a 16-ton girder it has been possible to reduce visual obstruction from supports, etc., to a minimum, and this is one of the redeeming points of this house. In the operator's booth two of the latest types of Edison machines are used with splendid results. The vaudeville programme last week consisted of Alquiste & Clayton, singing and dancing act; W. Villeraie, French comic singer; Paul Dajax, opera baritone, assisted by an orchestra of five pieces under Prof. J. Goulet.

NEW YORK'S MODEL HOUSE.

J. E. Costello Conducts High-Class Picture Theatre in Old Central Opera House.

The Central Opera House, Nos. 205 to 223 East 67th Street, New York City, was originally constructed at a cost of one and one-half million dollars, about twenty-one years ago by Jacob Ruppert for the German Societies of New York City. The building occupies more than one-half of a city block and contains one large auditorium with balcony having a seating capacity of 3,700. There is also a small auditorium with balcony having a seating capacity for 1,000 and standing room for 2,000 persons.

This magnificent structure has been vacant for a number of years and was used for no particular purpose until about a year ago when the small auditorium was turned into the most modern motion picture theatre in the city. The exterior of the building is illuminated by two 4,000 candle power flaming arc lamps and by an electric sign reading on two sides "Motion Pistures." The lobby is large. On the left is a spacious ladies' parlor furnished in antique upholstered mahogany with rich carpets on the floor and large mirrors on the wall forming a most attractive waiting room for the ladies and children. On the right hand side of the lobby is a gentlemen's smoking and lounging room which is equally well equipped.

Upon entering the auditorium one is impressed by the dignity and the completeness of the equipment. The comfortable seats are placed on an inclined floor and face a screen 18x24 feet in size, upon which is projected one of the most brilliant and steady pictures one could desire. The actual size of the picture is about 17 feet high and the distance from the lens to the screen is 90 feet.

Under the balcony there are placed about 30 green incandescent lamps of two candle power each, in ornamental glass shades, which furnish ample illumination at all times so there is no difficulty in finding a seat at any time. The walls are lined with large mirrors which further increase the illumination of the house by reflecting some of the light from the screen without interfering with the quality of the picture. An orchestra of four pieces furnishes the necessary and appropriate music for each picture and illustrated song.

The balcony hangs from the main ceiling and is reached by a spiral iron staircase on each side at the rear of the auditorium. The balcony is divided into boxes, having comfortable chairs and, as the balcony hangs from the ceiling on iron rods, there is absolutely no obstruction of any kind in any part of the house and the pictures can be seen from any point.

The operating room is located in the center and rear part of the balcony. The motion picture equipment consists of the following: Two Powers No. 6 machines, each one mounted on a specially made table and at the further end of the booth there is a double dissolving Stereopticon equipment of the latest improved design.

The exhibition of motion pictures at this theatre is of the highest class and reflects great credit upon Mr. J. E. Costello, the manager, whose photograph is herewith reproduced. Mr. Costello is an old timer in the business, having been associated with "Pop" Rock, the father of the Vitagraph Company, many years ago. The manager of the theatre is assisted by his son, Mr. Lawrence Costello. The projecting machines are in charge of Mr. John Burkhart, chief operator, and an assistant.

One cannot fail to be impressed with the system and rigid discipline of the management, employees and audience. There is no familiarity between ushers and patrons so annoying in many theatres. Everyone knows his place and keeps it. The show is first class in every respect and proves skillful management and clever work by the operator.

The writer believes that anyone interested in the business can learn something of advantage by making a call at the Central Opera House. It is a pity that this perfect motion picture house could not be located on the "Great White Way" where there is room for a high class exclusive motion picture theatre with large seating capacity.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Mr. Eugene W. Logan, of the Star Theatre, Syracuse, N. Y., with his wife and Miss Frost, called at the Vitagraph studios the past week to inspect the plant and learn something about the art of producing "Life Portrayals."

Prof. George Grechter, of the Avenue Theatre, Cleveland, Ohio, called on the Vitagraph and spent an afternoon witnessing the portrayal of some of the pictures which he will exhibit in his two Cleveland houses this season.

The day before Columbus Day, Tuesday, Oct. 11, "Brother Man," a dramatic, and absorbing in development and climax, will be discovered to be full of noble thought and high purpose, with enough passion and action in it to keep us wide awake all the time. Friday, Oct. 14, "On Her Doorstep," a sharp, crisp and clear comedy, with enough natural funny denouements to make a dyspeptic turn his liver upside down with laughter. A regular "laugh cure." It's coming! "The Legacy." It will be here on Saturday, Oct. 15, and it is a rich inheritance.

This is a time of peace, but the interest in the great war of the Union will never die. Few of the present generation have any real knowledge of the varied and trying events of that period, 1861-'65. The Vitagraph Company will soon release some of the most beautiful and stirring stories incidental to the Civil War—emotional, dramatic and artistic feature films.

Mr. J. Bernard French, superintendent of the Vitagraph studios, won two first prizes and a second prize at the motor cycle contests at Guttenberg, N. J., on Oct. 1. Mr. French is an expert in motorcycling, and displays with just pride the two beautiful medals and a pair of gold cuff buttons as evidence of his skill and speed.

"Three of Us" and "How She Won Him," two of the Vitagraph Company's latest productions, were the features at the Grand theatre, Youngstown, O., last week.

Edward Harris, formerly electrician at the Wilson Opera House, Main street, Hackettstown, N. J., has leased Apgar's Hall, Califon, and will transform that place into a motion picture theatre.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

FOR some time past, editorially and otherwise, The Film Index has devoted considerable space to a discussion of the dark auditorium moving picture theatres. Moreover, when the discovery was made that a curtain could be used that would show the projected pictures perfectly, even when the theatre was lighted, so that one could read a newspaper in his seat, The Film Index issued the dictum, "the dark picture theatre must go." And that was written more in a spirit of helpfulness and warning to exhibitors than as a demand; of helpfulness, because the lighted theatre will bring increased business, and of warning, because our modern social government will not long permit the existence of places of entertainment where youth may be contaminated.

Besides, viewing the question from the standpoint of the licensed manufacturer, he has an indisputable right to demand the observance, on the part of the licensed exhibitor, of everything in particular that lies within his power to commend the licensed product to picture theatre goers.

If discussion is raised on this point, one need not puzzle his mind to discover sufficient reason. Every licensed manufacturer today is on razor edge in praiseworthy competition to excel, both in point of quality of the finished product and of the high moral standard of each subject produced. By their cordial invitation to, and hearty co-operation with, worthy men and women in New York, the National Board of Censors was formed, the main object being to make moving picture entertainment the handmaiden to instruction and wholesome divertisement that the discovery of motography foreshadowed. And no expense has been spared to turn out pictures that will fully meet the expectations of the picture loving public, many single subjects alone costing $10,000 and upwards.

In the face of such lavish expenditure on the part of licensed manufacturers to furnish the finished product, and in view of the small proportional rentals charged exhibitors for the use of it,, is it too much to require of these latter that they provide a fitting and decent home for its presentation? If the manufacturer is able to continue to furnish the highest and best product possible at such low rental rates to the exhibitor, it is not because he can now sell so many prints of each subject, but for the primary reason that he had faith in his enterprise and invested the capital that enabled him to create a market.

Is it not the mission and duty of every exhibitor of the licensed product to see that his patrons can view the pictures to the best possible advantage and amid the cleanest and most favorable surroundings. Here the exhibitor must bear his share of the burden, in the development of the picture industry, and eagerly seize every opportunity to make the picture theatre a clean, safe resort, where every member of the family, young and old, can attend without any risk of being subjected to baneful influences.

There can be no mincing of the matter. DARK PICTURE THEATRES MUST GO.

The exhibitor who persists in ignoring intelligent and moral opinion in this matter, will find himself placed on the shelf in company with wooden ploughs and other relics of semi-barbarism. He is a real menace to the moving picture business and, if he persists, the law will compel him to do what he should gladly do voluntarily.

It is unfair to the licensed manufacturers and to the many licensed exhibitors, who have already taken advantage of the improved lighting systems and curtains, to have such "back numbers" in the licensed ranks. As a rule these "dark" theatres are in the very neighborhoods where the utmost precautions should be made against the encroachments of vice, and where the exhibitor's eye can never see beyond a nickel. Such men must not be allowed to bring discredit on a great and thriving industry. They must either light their theatres or be driven out of business.

This article has been suggested by the reading of an article in the September issue of the "Pictorial Review," written by Anna Steese Richardson, and entitled "The Menace of the Moving Picture Theatre." While thoroughly agreeing with that lady in the spirit that prompted her to write the article, I respectfully exclaim against the high, melodramatic coloring employed in the narration of facts; and, while I commend the lady's earnestness and zeal, I am compelled to pronounce her effort as being inclined to exaggeration and her treatment of the subject one that evidently aims at creating a thrill. The mere statement of the cases cited by the lady would be sufficiently to thrill any decent man or woman.

Miss Richardson, however, has no disposition to treat the moving picture unfairly, as the following excerpt shows, and it also shows her unsparing treatment of disreputable exhibitors:

"The moving picture has a mission and a broad one. It should be an invaluable educational factor in every community. It should teach geography, history, travel, science and art in a way that will derectly reach the masses. It should provide the individual of limited income with a pleasant and profitable evening of tabloid drama or comedy at ten cents. It has been proven that in certain localities crowded with what are known as detached men, i. e., men without families or homes, it has been a successful rival to the saloon. It gave a man a decent place to go for the price of a drink, and he went.

"The inventors and makers of moving picture films meant that this should become the popular, wholesome, normal amusement of the people. They yielded to public sentiment and submitted their output to a national board of censors who had the right to strike out any picture which would vitiate the moral taste of spectators. But there was just one factor in which these men did not count, and that was the dark auditorium, affording opportunity to the moral degenerate and the "cadet" to seek their victims and ply their trade. It was not until criminal records unfolded tale after tale of moral depravity and youthful tragedy that the police department, the Children's Society and the various social agencies of New York united to make war on the dark auditorium.

"In New York City there are 700 picture shows. In every city of any size there are picture shows by the score. Even an unpretentious village has one house, and a real town anywhere from two to four. Some of these shows are run by men who honestly try to live up to the law and refuse admission to children under sixteen when unaccompanied by guardians. These managers are themselves decent, and keep a respectable class of employes around them. In other houses, from manager to cleaners, the entire staff may represent the riff-raff of humanity, conniving at offences against society and combining to evade the law."

Outlining a remedy for the evils enumerated, Miss Richardson writes:

"There is a remedy for all this, a way to make the moving picture show what it should be, a wholesome, educational institution to furnish amusement for the masses, the poor man's theatre, where he can send his children in perfect safety. It is—Light! The dark auditorium is not a necessity, it is an economy.

"The pictures are now projected through darkened space to a huge canvas screen. That screen can be coated with a newly patented material of which aluminum forms the basis, and the pictures can then be seen in a house as light or lighter than the ordinary theatre. Pictures shown on this screen are free from the annoying flicker, but more importantly those who prey upon youth will find it impossible to carry out their vile designs in an auditorium where the safe and blessed light reaches every bench and every corner of the room.

"The Film Index, the leading publication devoted to the moving picture trade, has been urging the use of this curtain and the lighting of the moving picture auditorium for almost six months. So far, only one moving picture house among New York's seven hundred has introduced the new screen. Why? Because it costs $1.00 per square foot to chemically treat the old one.

"A law compelling the use of a chemically treated curtain will eventually solve the problem."

Miss Richardson claims that "practically no out-of-town houses have adopted" the new screen and I now request all exhibitors throughout the country, who are presenting pictures in a lighted auditorium, to write me, or the home office in New York, giving the name of the theatre, the manager and the town or city. The list will be published for the lady's benefit.

I, myself, can give the names of a great many theatres here in Chicago and elsewhere, in which pictures have been run in well lighted auditoriums for some time, and through the kindness of Frank L. Hough, traveling salesman for the Edison type B machine, I am able to furnish some interesting information, appropos to this article, concerning Decatur, Ill.

Mr. Hough was in that city recently, when the Civic League, having read Miss Richardson's artitle, was stirred to investigate the home theatres. The Colonial and Colonade theatres, managed by Mr. Harvey, and the Bijou theatre, managed by Mr. Sigfried, were found to be excellently lighted, and the good ladies then signified their desire to censor the pictures presented at each of the houses. Messrs. Harvey and Sigfried immediately expressed their pleasure with such co-operation, notwithstanding that every picture used by them is censored, either by the National Board of Censors, New York, or by the Chicago Board, a fact unknown to the members of the Decatur Civic League.

This is an instance where Miss Richardson's remedy was in full operation, and yet well meaning citizens saw an opportunity to do something for the picture theatre which had been, and is being, done by some of the most intelligent and reputable professional men and women of New York City.

When will this hypercritical treatment of the picture theatre cease?

"JUSTINIAN AND THEODORA"

A Stately Classic Film by Selig

JAS. S. McQUADE

SEVERAL months ago, I announced in my Chicago letter that William M. Selig had been fortunate enough to enlist the services of Elbert Hubbard, the Sage of East Aurora, for the production of "Justinian and Theodora" in picture form.

The well-informed reader will recall that the classic drama of that title was written by Elbert and Alice Hubbard, and that it is due to their happy efforts that "the one gleam of light during the dark ages" has been made to gladden our eyes and stir our hearts in these modern days, when so much of justice and orderly government that we enjoy can be traced directly across the wide gap of years, to the great Justinian.

But it must be remembered that the reduction of a drama to the scenario form, required for a pictured production, necessitates considerable change in the incidents of the story and the introduction of various scenes that are left to the imagination in the dramatic production. That Mr. Hubbard has succeeded so admirably in arranging and writing this stately, picturesque historical romance for picture use bespeaks his possession of an art that is in worthy keeping with the other splendid gifts with which Nature has endowed him.

To make the presentation of this great film still more delightful to picture lovers, Mr. Selig has been successful in gaining the consent of Mr. Hubbard to appear before the camera in characteristic poses, for a few seconds, so that the first 20 or 30 feet of the film will show the famous Fra himself, bowing to the welcome of millions of spectators.

Just as in the "Life of Moliere," which was reviewed by me in the issue of Oct. 1, it was essential to throw a little light on the man and his times, for an intelligent understanding of the pictures, so, in "Justinian and Theodora," it is even more necessary to have some familiarity with the lives of these titular personages and their times.

The events treated of in "Justinian and Theodora" are laid in the period between A. D. 518-523. The principal scenes are laid in Constantinople and Ravenna, Italy. At that time Constantinople was the financial mistress of the world, and the artistic and literary centre of Christendom, being the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire. Justin I. was then on the throne and filling out the closing years of his reign.

Justinian, his nephew, was born in Bulgaria, in 483 A. D., and traveled on foot to his uncle's court, at Constantinople, when 18 years old. Unlike his uncle, he was educated and soon rose to the position of Prime Minister of the Eastern Empire.

Theodora was a daughter of Acacius, a native of Cyprus, and keeper of the wild beasts in the amphitheatre at Constantinople. Acacius was killed while discharging his dangerous duties, and Theodora and her two sisters assumed them after his death. They were scarcely more than children at that time, and their occupation brought them prominently before the public eye. All three were born in the theatre and took parts in plays from the time that each was able to toddle. Theodora was a wonderful impersonator of character, and that without speaking a word. As a mimic of celebrated personages, she delighted her audiences. Mr. Hubbard, in Act I. of "Justinian and Theodora," thus describes her: "She was the original Pierrot, and seemed to have the subtle skill of the divine Sara, the intellect of a Rachel, the tragic qualities of Duse, the wistfulness of Maude Adams and the wit of May Irwin."

There was a ban on the theatre in those days, so that actors and actresses were in low social standing. It was all the more astounding, therefore, under the circumstances, when Justinian openly avowed his love for Theodora and, in the end, secretly married her. As his uncle Justin's favorite nephew, he was looked upon as his successor, and the alliance was frowned upon by the aged Emperor.

Prince Rechizad, another nephew of the Emperor, but not in his favor, also loved Theodora passionately, and determined to have her even at the risk of being charged with treason. When, therefore, Justinian was taken captive, while on his way to Rome, by the followers of the Gothic king, Theodoric, and held as a hostage for three years at Ravenna, Prince Rechizad conspired to seize the throne. Justinian, being advised by a secret messenger, sent by Theodora, of the perilous condition of his crown, contrived to escape from Ravenna and arrived just in time to prevent the consummation of the plot of Rechizad. The latter was slain, and Justinian and Theodora were crowned by the expiring Justin.

I take this opportunity at this point to express my delicate appreciation of the courtesies extended me at the Selig plant by Superintendent Tom Nash and Producer Otis Turner. The first positive print had just been put together, without the sub titles, when I requested the privilege of having it run off, and Mr. Turner most kindly sat at my right and informed me on the scenes and incidents of long since past years as they were unfolded.

From Mr. Turner I learned that two full months had been spent in making preparations for the production in building typical Gothic fastnesses; in providing the multitudinous and archaeological array of properties and accoutrements; in designing, fashioning and selecting the bewildering variety of rare costumes; in the quest and choosing of the rich hangings, tapestries and gorgeous velvets, and in rehearsing, training and massing the great company of men and women employed in the production. After all these had been in readiness and the opening scene was entered upon, I learned that it took about 9 days to complete the film in what might be called the carefully censored rough. Since then deft finishing touches have been added here and there, so that the film, when offered to the public, will represent the finished product of the best that brains, art, experience, patience untiring supervision and superior facilities can furnish.

The matter of costumes alone taxed the ability and knowledge of one of the best authorities in this country for over two weeks. Mr. Fritz Schultz of Fritz Schultz & Co., one of the largest costuming establishments in the world, took personal charge of this department and devoted his entire time to it—designing this, arranging for that and collecting the others. No makeshifts were allowed, the compelling aim being to reproduce the costumes of the time as accurately as human skill and knowledge could accomplish.

Then take the scenic adjuncts—one of them only, for space forbids detail. The great ramparts wall surrounding the palace of Theodoric, at Ravenna, that part of it which is shown in the pictures, took two weeks to build. It was first built of solid masonry, on the shore of the lake in the Selig grounds, and then filled out with stucco and faced with cement, so as to represent perfectly the hewn stone used in Gothic architecture. It was built wide enough on top to permit the passing of armed men and the walking of two abreast. The escape of Justinian, when he scales its precipitous height, accompanied by his followers, and the near discovery of the guard, and then the actual discovery, followed by the plunge of the fleeing men into the dark waters beneath, amid a shower of spears, is about one of the most realistic and thrilling scenes yet offered in motography.

The many impressive scenes revealed in this film, if treated according to their due artistic worth, would take pages to describe; but I can faithfully and truly state that the intelligent man or woman given to research and conversant with the costumes, manners, architecture (interior and exterior), decorations, armors and arms, and all the other surroundings of civilization in those early days will find in "Justinian and Theodora" a wealth of material for study, reflection and comparison. And the fuller their knowledge, the more pleasure they will take in proving the fidelity of the Selig film to things as they were then. Moreover, to the many who will find satisfaction in witnessing the scenes of those semi-barbaric times, without delving into hidden lore for purposes of comparison, the eye and mind will find little time for rest while "Justinian and Theodora" is being presented.

CHICAGO HEALTH DEPARTMENT ADVOCATE PICTURES.

Motion pictures are advocated by the Chicago health department to educate the public in matters pertaining to health.

All nationalities enjoy pictures. There is nothing in the amusement which restricts it to classes. It is the number of people which can be reached by the motion pictures where tracts or pamphlets would fail that has caused the health department to advance this unique campaign. Relatively few people, say the health officials, will go across the street to hear a lecture on health. But if motion pictures are announced as part of the lecture, hosts will come, they declare.

The pictures and lecturers can be taken into the most illiterate districts and be of benefit to the people. Those who cannot understand the lecturers will understand the pictures. Those who can understand the lecturers will be doubly impressed.

The health department has two sets of motion pictures on the fly pest. During the last sixty-five days these pictures have been shown to 43,825 people. They were shown in the 5 cent theatres in the congested districts.

PRISONERS SEE MOTION PICTURES.

With amazement, enjoyment and interest, nearly 100 prisoners at the State penitentiary, Columbus, Ohio, for the first time in their lives, saw motion pictures September 26. The 1500 others who saw them were equally delighted.

Instead of the regular chapel services at the prison, usually consisting of songs, orchestra music and a sermon, the prisoners were entertained by several subjects taken from life, and projected on a huge screen stretched over the platform.

Illustrated songs gave variety to the entertainment.

MRS. MOORE MAY RUN NEW THEATRE.

Mrs. John Moore, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., who has been in Bloomsburg, Pa., conferring with William Hutton regarding the building of a large amusement place on North and Main streets, which will be used for a motion picture theatre, is evidently much pleased with the prospects. Mrs. Moore is a wealthy promoter and has done wonders in the amusement line in that part of Pennsylvania. She always strives to put on the best class of entertainment for the patrons and if the project goes through Bloomsburg can look forward for some great picture shows this coming winter. Mr. Hutton hasn't said when he will start the new theatre, but from what can be learned building will begin soon. The house will seat over 1000 persons. It will be strictly fire-proof and will be equipped with all modern appliances.

Thomas Hicks, who has been running a picture theatre in Mt. Gretna, Pa., during the summer, returned to Myerstown last week.

Motion pictures at Electric Park, Roanoke, Va., have attracted large crowds all during the summer months.

The Elite theatre building, Hutchinson, Kan., is undergoing repairs. The house was opened with pictures some time during September.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 6.—The alternating current is so named besause it oscillates or reverses in other words, goes back and forth over the same wires and through the same lamps and motors many times a second.

The alternating current may be of any given voltage, but this voltage is only apparent because at the instant of each reversal of the current there is no voltage generated.

Due to the fact that there are moments of no voltage on an alternating system, it is necessary to make the frequency or change of reversal many times per second in order to maintain the illumination constant.

"ETECTRICAL TALK" NO. 7

In order to clearly impress upon you the difference between direct and alternating current, I want to offer one more example.

The Mississippi river gathers the water in the upper part of the country, flowing continuously towards the gulf; the water has a steady, direct flow practically from north to south. A large water-wheel may be set in the river and due to the downward flow of the water it would rotate and produce power. The sun gathers the water from the gulf to the clouds, which put the water back again in the upper part of the country from where it flows. The river, thus completing this direct or continuous current water flow.

The lower part of the Hudson river, on the other hand, is a good representation of the alternating current system, because when the tide is low the fresh water flows downward towards the ocean. Within a few hours when the tide rises again, the water flows in the opposite direction against the downward stream of water—actually reversing it. This is an alternating current water system, surging back and forth in the river with the rise and fall of the tide and the cycle of reversal of this current is equal to the rise and fall of the tide. If a large water-wheel was put in the Hudson river it would turn in one direction; when the tide is low it would stop for a short time; when the tide begins to rise and the water-wheel would be turned in the opposite direction.

This shows you in the simplest possible way how an alternating current, whether represented by water or electricity, actually stands still or rather is not produced at all at the instant the flow of the current is being reversed; in other words there is no current or no pressure or no voltage at the instant of current reversal.

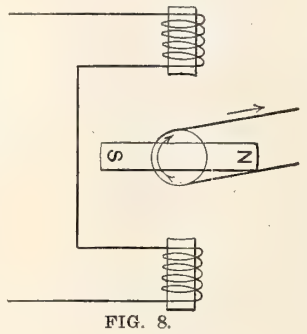

FIG. 8.

In "Electrical Talk No. 4," illustration Figure 3, shows a direct current electric generator having an iron core terminating into two pole pieces called the "field" surrounding part of the rotating armature. There is also a device mounted on the armature shaft and connected to the armature called the "commutator" and there are also two or more brushes which collect the current generated by the armature through the commutator. Practically all direct current generators have to be equipped with a commutator. The purpose of which is to keep the current flow in one direction.

An alternating current generator does not require a commutator, and is therefore much simpler in construction and furthermore, as the commutator can be dispensed with, that it is possible to generate a much higher voltage and there is absolutely no chance of sparking.

Figure 7 illustrates a simple form of the alternating current generator. The rotating magnet is mounted on a shaft which, through the means of a pulley and belt, is rotated at high speed between the upper and lower iron cores. These iron cores are surrounded by coils of copper wire which may be connected to the line wires. Suppose the magnet is rotatitng at under the upper iron core in Figure 7 the said iron core will be magnetized to the fullest extent, making the lower end of it a north pole magnet and the upper end a south pole as indicated by "S." At the same instant when the rotating south pole "S" is directly over the lower stationary iron core it will be magnetized to the fullest extent south and north as indicated by "S" and "N." As we continue to revolve the magnet we will stop at the position indicated in Figure 8. At this instant the rotating magnet is exerting no influence on either one of the iron cores.

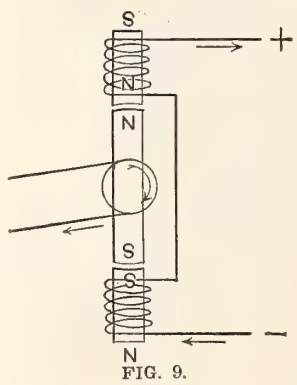

FIG. 9.

Continuing the movement of the magnet, we find as illustrated in Fgure 9, that the magnetism in the upper and lower iron core has been reversed. Going still further, as indicated in Figure 10, there is again a point or instant when there is no magnetism in the upper and lower iron core.

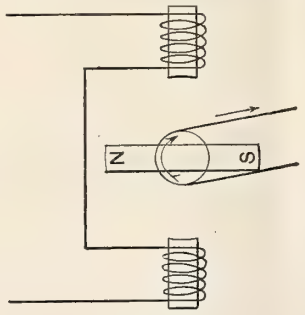

FIG. 10.

It may be well to impress upon you the fact that when you rotate or move a magnet towards or from a piece of soft iron, or in fact any kind of iron, the iron will remain magnetized as long as it is under the influence of the magnet, which in the case illustrated is rotating between two soft iron cores.

I want to further impress upon you that when a coil of copper wire is put on a bar or core of soft iron, electric current can be induced or created in the copper coil by suddenly moving a magnet past the end of the soft iron core upon which the coil is mounted.

It is also a fact that if you move the north pole of a magnet past a soft iron core surrounded by a copper wire coil, electricity will be generated in the coil flowing in one direction and if you move this same north pole back and forth the current will be pulsating, but it will always be in the same direction.

Suppose we influence this same core and coil by first moving a north pole magnet past it, the current will flow in one direction, instead of coming back with the north pole magnet we bring around the south pole then the magnetism in the soft iron core will be reversed and a current will be generated in the coil, but flowing in the opposite direction.

As it is always easier to secure a rotating motion, dynamos or electric generators for alternating current, have the magnet pole pieces mounted on a shaft, and the soft iron cores and the copper wire magnet coils are mounted on a frame surrounding the rotating magnet pole pieces. This arrangement permits sudden and smooth movement of the rotating magnet past the stationary iron cores which are thereby first magnetized in one direction then in the other as fast as the magnet pole pieces are being rotated, and in consequence thereof electric current is generated in the copper wire coils which is then distributed to the line wires.

It is obvious that the magnetism will be strenuous in the iron cores and the current on the line will consequently be at the highest voltage or strength, when the rotating magnet is in the position indicated in Figures 7 and 9.

It is also evident that when the rotating magnet is in the position indicated in Figures 8 and 10, there is no voltage nor current on the line, because at that instant there is no magnetism in the soft iron cores, but the moment the rotating magnet is turned slightly, each one of the two poles is nearing its respective stationary iron core, which is thereby magnetized and begins to generate current in the copper magnet core.

To give an illustration of the flow of current we might assume that when the magnet is in the position shown in Figure 7 the upper line wire is positive (+) and the lower is negative (—), but when the magnet is in the position as shown

"THE SONG THAT REACHED HIS HEART."—Old songs, like old wines, become more mellow and sweet with age, and what man or woman whose sun of life is just beginning to dip toward the Western sky has not old memories awakened and bygone days brought back by the soft melody of some long-forgotten song? We pass an open window and catch the strains of some song of long ago, a tune that mother used to sing, or some air that she loved best, and our minds and fancies go rushing back through the corridors of time to all that was once sweet and dear in life. And does it not make one better and truer after all? Of course it does.

It was evident that the author of the Edison picture, "The Song That Reached His Heart," had this thought in mind when he wrote the story, for we are shown a rough lumberman at work in the Canadian woods hewing down giant trees and trimming them for the market, surrounded by all sorts and conditions of men in the atmosphere where rough jokes and strong drink are the predominating elements; while in contrast we are shown a refined, delicate woman singing the low, soft strains of "Annie Laurie" into a phonograph, which has caught the beauty of the song and the sweetness of the singer's voice and stamped them in wax, from which records will be taken, moulded and sent to the four corners of the earth.

Away out in Western Canada we see a man of brawn and muscle made rough and rude by his life and surroundings, buying a phonograph, and with his pals seated of an evening listening to the old songs of long ago. The sight of the joy and pleasure it brings into their lives is only a make-believe representation of what gratitude the world owes Thomas A. Edison for his wonderful invention. Alone we see the lumberman listening to the song of "Annie Laurie," and as the strains of that dear old song sink deep into his heart the past comes before him, and he sees his mother seated at the old organ, father with his evening paper and his pipe, while beside him stands his boyhood sweetheart singing this old song. As the vision fades he tries to cast off his sweet spell, and seeks forgetfulness at a gambling table in a nearby Western hotel.

The threads of fate have drawn the singer of the song of the earlier scene to this same hotel, and just as the lumberman is about to commit the crime of theft the notes of the song reach him again from the rooms above where she is stayinig. Drawn by the charm of his spell, he listens outside her door and, while listening, discovers a plot to rob the girl within. The subsequent events reveal his bravery and the saving of her life, which act nearly terminates his own; but ere the picture is brought to its romantic close we discover that the singer is none other than his boyhood sweetheart, and we feel that "The Song That Reached His Heart" will eventually find its echoes in the chimes of wedding bells some sweet day.

This picture has special interest due to the fact that all the exterior scenes were taken in the actual stage settinig that the author intended it should be, mainly the Northwestern Canadian woods, and much credit and thanks is due to the Canadian Pacific Railroad in helping the Edison players in securing the proper stage setting for such a charming story of romance and love.

"THE CHUNCHO INDIANS OF THE AMAZON RIVER, PERU."—This is a most unusual film and possesses great interest. The Chuncho Indians were formerly the most savage of all the known tribes in South America. They inhabit the Parene Valley, which even to-day is accessible only by mule-back or pack train. Some twenty years ago an English syndicate purchased from the Government of Peru one million two hundred and fifty thousand acres of land in the Parene Valley, and as a result great coffee plantations now grow where formerly there was nothing but dense tropical jungle. The Chuncho Indians have been carefully trained in the art of coffee cultivation and harvesting, thus becoming useful members of the community.

In our picture we see them on their way down the mountain on a pack train, passing along the narrow margin of difficult mountain trails, going through gorges of unusual beauty and over the curious swinging bridges which indeed swing so much that we are almost alarmed for the safety of those crossing them. After showing the preparation of coffee in a somewhat curious way, and preparing for shipment, we now visit the Indian as he appears in more of his natural state. On very curious native boats which seem so badly balanced that one wondows how they keep afloat at all, we see the Indians take their regular trips on the river, navigating their craft with a skill that could not be surpassed by one in a boat built on the most scientific plan. Finally we land with the party and are shown a typical view of a Chuncho home with all the members of the family.

This film shows a section of the country probably but little known to most of our readers, and because of the fact that the scenery itself is so picturesquely beautiful, we feel confident that it will meet with popular approval.

"THE STOLEN FATHER."—Here is a story entirely out of the ordinary run of subjects with an unusual plot and series of incidents that are certainly novel and interesting.

The early scenes show the struggles of a young woman in New York to obtain employment and to support herself. It becomes evident that the search and the struggle are anything but easy for her and that she is penniless and near the stage of desperation. Walking into the park she sits down on a bench and tries to think over the situation and find some solution. As she sits there an old gentleman, evidently a traveler, comes on, and being weary, perhaps not feeling well, sits down not far from her. In taking his handkerchief from his pocket, a large and well-filled wallet drops to the ground. The girl notes it, and stooping, hands it to the old man, but not until she has noticed the amount of money which it seems to contain. Not very long after, when she is again busy with her own thoughts, the old gentleman tries to speak to her, but in vain, and she only comes to when collapses in a heapq against the back of the bench. Jumping up, she goes to him, but is unable to obtain any response. She calls for help and some passerby summons an officer who makes an examination of the man and assures her that he is not dead. He asks her if the man is her father. Seeing the helpless old gentleman there before her and knowing that he possesses the means to care for himself and for her, and knowing that he cannot protest and that no one else will be the wiser, the girl yields to the temptation and tells the officer that she is the old man's daughter. They take the old man home in an ambulance and she has him carried to the big front room in the boarding-house where she is in arrears already for her own rent. Of course, the landlady demurs at another member, and demands evidence that her rent will be forthcoming. Having gone thus far, our little heroine takes the wallet from the old man's pocket and pays the rent for the two rooms, carefully returning the wallet to its owner's pocket thereafter. The later scenes show how she cares for the old man, how he very slowly recovers, and how his own funds provide for his own care and for the maintenance of the girl, who has become his self-appointed nurse. One day while she is reading to him, we see her start at some notice in the paper, and on the screen appears an advertisement from a man in England who is in search of his father, a traveler who disappeared shortly after landing in New York and with a considerable sum of money. Our heroine at once realizes that this must be the son of her helpless charge and the temptation assails her to remain silent and continue to enjoy the prosperity which has meant so much to her and saved her from apparently impending disaster. After a short mental struggle, she decides to be true to herself and write a letter calling the son to America. Now the old man, who has been under her care so long, has recovered more than she suspects and has gradually passed from a stage of suspicion to one of regard and finally affection for the girl who has nursed him back to a semblance of health. He sees the paper, understands what it means to her and sees her write the letter, thus triumphing over her temptation. And then the son comes and she feels that her term of office has expired and that there is nothing for her to do but go back to the weary search for employment, the following of help wanted ads. in the papers and besieging the offices where girls are employed. She hands him her account of the moneys expended and says "good-bye" to the old man. And then she gets a surprise, for instead of being helpless, he comes and stands before her, shows her the result of her nursing in his recovered strength. She is glad, but still feels that she has no longer a place in his life. He asks her to stay, she points to his son; but the son, understanding the father's mind, and perhaps seeing the beautiful face and the sweetness of the girl who has done so much for his father, adds his own invitation to that of the old man. The picture closes with a happy trio and a promise of good days to come for them all together, perhaps of a love story which will grow to a wedding so many days or months ahead.

The picture is simply but beautifully played and its originality should commend it strongly to those who are tired of the hackneyed everyday themes of the silent drama.

"HANK AND LANK, OR THEY GET WISE TO A NEW SCHEME."—In this instance Hank and Lank step into good fortune quite by accident. Pausing in front of a bargain drygoods store, a young lady rushes up and asks Hank to hold her baby while she goes inside to make a few purchases. Shortly after she returns and liberally tips the little man for his services as nurse.

Lank sees how easily Hank has made his money and resolves to try the trick himself. Hank agrees to help him, but they wait some time and no lady with an infant to hold puts in an appearance.

The scene changes to the lawn of a residence nearby and shows a young woman and her husband about to take the baby out for an airing. The mother insists that she has too much work to do and turns the baby over to her husband with instructions that he be back in half an hour.

The proud young father and his charge are returning home at the appointed time, when two jolly young fellows stop them and invite Father into a saloon for a drink. Father cannot resist the temptation, and when Lank appears on the scene he put him in charge of the baby and tells him he'll be out in five minutes.

Five—ten—fifteen minutes drag by and Lank yawns.

Pulling a pillow from the baby-cab, he makes a bed on the sidewalk and drowses off to sleep.

A moment later he awakens to find the mother of the infant yanking him to his feet and demanding to know where her husband is. Poor Lank suffers a good drubbing at the hands of the irate mother, when the father with his two friends come on the scene. Lank has not waited for his tip, and Father hurries off after his angry wife.

"PAPA'S FIRST OUTING."—Contrary to the regular custom of the Smithkins family, Papa is persuaded by mother and the children to take a long-needed rest at the seashore instead of themselves. He demurs, pleading a rush of business, but the unselfish hearts will not hear of it, and the next day he is bundled off to the seaside summer resort.

A week goes by and the daily letter from Father keeps them in touch with the little head of the family. He is having a good time, but longs to be back with them.

It is unfortunate that a stray paragraph in the daily paper sets Mrs. Smithkins wondering what kind of a "good" time Papa is having. The paragraph reads: "Lured from Wife and Family by Beach Affinity," and goes on to explain how a perfectly honorable family man falls a victim to the wiles of a seashore Circe.

Mrs. Smithkins reads the horrifying news to the children and all are unanimous in their opinion that Father should either come straight home or should be watched. They decide on the latter scheme and a female detective is put on his trail.

Another week passes and the despairing detective, who is unable to find any evidence against Father. Twice she has seen him absolutely refuse to make eyes, even when he was invited, and sometimes his aloofness with the feminine contingent of the place has bordered onto incivility and discourtesy.

Resolved to try the trick herself, she follows Father, and after much difficulty she engages him in a conversation. Engaging her most subtle arts she makes his promise her a boat ride and then leaves him for time to make up the rest of her plan. Her snapshot camera she turns over to a boy with instructions to snap them when she gets Father in a compromising position.

The result of the day's work is a sheaf of photographs picturing Smithkins spooning with the female detective and which are forwarded to Mrs. Smithkins with a long letter, mostly imaginary, in which Father's perfidy is exaggeratedly described.

When Father gets home the photographs are shown him, and what follows is best reserved for the time you see it in the film.

"THE COWBOY'S MOTHER-IN-LAW."—Nellie Blair, the niece of a wealthy ranchman, and an orphan, comes to make her home with her uncle, and shortly after her arrival finds that the whole "Circle A" outfit, every manjack on the place, is in love with her. One by one they propose until Charley Martin, better known as "Cayuse" Charley, makes an appeal to Nellie's fancy and wins her consent to marriage.

A short time later they are married and go to live in "Cayuse" shack. Cayuse is the happiest man in the world, and his ever-smiling face strikes the envy chord in the other hearts. As a benedict, at least for the first few months, he proves ideal, spending his evenings at home, "doin'" the dishes or scrubbing the floors to make Nellie's work lighter, but finally his long spell of usefulness ends.

After the first few little excuses to get away evenings, Nellie finds that he does not care much for housework, and when she asks him why he has so neglected her he retorts sharply that he reckons a woman ought to do her own work.

It is only a slight step from neglect to ill-treatment and one morning, after being roughly abused by "Cayuse," Nellie resolves that she must appeal to her old-time friends to help her in bringing Charley to terms.

The boys are indignant when they hear that Charley has been maltreating their former sweetheart, and endeavor to think of some plan to bring him to time. "Better string him up," one suggests. 'Ride him on a rail," says another. "Listen to this," from Pete the Coyote, who has been reading the Lariat Bugle, "Mother-in-Law Tames Vicious Hubhand."

After reading the item through, all of them suggest that they see Nellie and have her send Mother down. They learn to their dismay that Nellie has no mother.

In the end the following plan is adopted. Pete is

"LIFE PORTRAYALS"

THE LEGACY

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15th

Here Is a Homespun Life Portrayal from Actual Experience—A Poetic Drama of General Appreciation and Vital Interest

It came as a genuine surprise when old Mr. and Mrs. Jones inherited a large fortune with the distinct proviso that they occupy the swell town house of the deceased to properly sustain the social distinction and dignity of their acquired wealth.

With many misgivings and regrets they close the old farm house in which they have lived for over fifty years and start for the city. On the train they are very much "upsot" by the novelty of things. Crossing the river on the ferryboat, they are astonished at the skyscrapers which loom up before them and which they have a sneaking feeling will fall over on top of them. A gentlemanly stranger on the boat who volunteers some information is looked upon with suspicion by the unsophisticated couple, who take an extra grip on their goods and chattels.

In the great city at last, they try to find their way unaided to upper Fifth Avenue, where the inherited mansion is located. Unaccustomed to trolleys and elevated roads, they decide to take "shank's mare" and go plodding on, followed by a constantly increasing crowd of "ragtag and bobtail" as they are passing through the thickly populated tenement districts of the west side, where they are greeted as "Rube."

Reaching one of the city parks, they seat themselves on a bench; in the cool of the evening, they become drowsy, the old gentleman takes off his boots and hat, while the old lady removes her bonnet, thus making themselves comfortable, they fall into a restful doze. Their slumbers are disturbed by a policeman, who awakens them, and, after questioning them, learns where they want to go, calls a taxicab, sends them on their way, and they are taken speedily and safely to their place among the upper ten.

They press the button and a stiff uniformed lackey appears at the front door and bids them enter, which they do with much fear and trembling lest they offend the gents in brass buttons, whom Mr. Jones wants to shake hands with and make friends, which friendliness is received with coldness and contempt. The old folks are disturbed and wish themselves back on the farm, where every neighbor around the place is nearer " 'an a relation."

In the quiet of the elegant boudoirs they feel like cats in a strange garret, and don't know how to make use of the elaborate furnishings. The maid and valet appear upon the scene and insist upon dressing Mr. and Mr. Jones for dinner. Mrs. Jones is too frightened to resist, but Jones says: "By heck! I ain't no infant, and nobody has put on my clothes but my mother, and I can't so far forgit myself as to allow any other fellow to deprive me of my manful right as a natural and free-born independent citizen, and what's more, I ain't going to rob another feller of his manhood by allowing him to do it." The valet insists, and Jones submits with the remark: "I don't mind a little help, but it ain't my style."

At dinner the butler and servants await their coming. When the old people are seated at the table they are waited upon like children,

The last straw comes when they are escorted to separate bed rooms. Mrs. Jones is snugly tucked in bed, and Mr. Jones is provided by the valet with a suit of pajamas, which he indignantly slams on the floor and exclaims: "Goshamighty! This is beyond all tolerance. I ain't never wore my clothes to bed yit, and I'm dang sure I ain't going to begin now. The old-fashioned nightgown is good enough for me and anybody else that's got common sense enough to be sensible."

During the night the old couple manage to have a little private conversation, arrange an escape from all this "pesky" style and nonsense, get their things together, stealthily leave the mansion and all its "vanity and vexation" behind them and return to the old home, where we leave them located and thoroughly satisfied to be content in the peaceful enjoyment of all its blessings.

BROTHER MAN

Tuesday, October 11th

A Dramatic Play in Which Two Men of Opposite Environments Recognize and Appreciate the Good Qualities of Each Other and Extend the Hand of Fellowship in the Establishment of the Brotherhood and Betterment of Mankind.

At the club the young husband receives word that an interesting event is about to occur. Hatless and coatless he rushes home, and after watching and waiting learns that it is a boy. The doctor leaves the house and the happy father falls asleep in a chair.

A burglar climbs up the porch, enters the house, and, coming into the room where the man is sleeping, holds him up and takes his watch, and, holding him at bay, searches the secretary and finds a roll of money which he readily appropriates. The young man tells the burglar not to disturb his wife, who is confined in the adjoining room. The thief asks what's the trouble. When told, his sense of manhood asserts itself and he gives back the watch and the money, takes a ten-dollar bill of his own and asks the child's father to give the ten-spot to the kid with his compliments, and tells him he will try to brace up and lead a better life.

He leaves in haste, but is caught by a policeman just as he is stepping from the porch and brought back to the owner of the place. He might have had the prisoner arrested and sent to prison for life, but, remembering the fellow's tenderness for his wife and new-born babe, he feels a responsive feeling of brotherhood which he cannot dismiss from his mind and awakens an interest in the other fellow who has gone wrong but shows evidence of being reclaimed. He tells the officer the man had called to see him on business and he had just dismissed him; the officer begs his pardon and goes back to his post.

Overcome with emotion, the burglar cannot express his gratitude to the man whom he would have robbed. He grasps his hand and thanks him heartily for his kindness. The gentleman gives the fellow his card and tells him he will help him find honest employment and become an honored member of the brotherhood of man.

ON HER DOORSTEP

Friday, October 14th

A Refined Society Comedy, with Some Very Funny Examples of What a Fellow Will Do to Spite Himself in Hope of Getting Square with Somebody Else.

"A Lover's Quarrel." All about smoking a cigarette. She insists upon smoking if he does. He objects to women smoking. This is all done good naturedly until he tries to assert man's supremacy over women by taking the cigarette from her and throwing it away. She gets real mad now, gives him back his engagement ring and tells him to go. He does, but no further than the doorstep of her home, where he determines to sit until she comes to him and asks him to return. The rain is pouring in torrents, and every time she looks out of the window she sees her lover sitting on the step, drenched and miserable. She orders the servants to drive him from the house. He is attracting attention and creating scandal. The hirelings go; the young "Spartan" bribes them to let him remain at his post, and they report to their mistress that it is impossible to get him to leave.

"What's to be done? It's disgraceful. I'll just tell mamma." So she goes to her mother and reports to her the condition of things. The mother goes down to the front door and calls a policeman, whom she asks to make the young man go home. The young fellow explains the case and the policeman simply laughs and moves on. Lovers' quarrels are out of his jurisdiction.

Mamma goes back to bed and tells her daughter she must settle it herself. The young beau holds the fort against all comers—milkman, butcher, baker; and all the rest of the early risers stop, laugh, and go on their way thinking him drunk or crazy, but the young man sits on. His girl is frantic, tries to fight against herself and forget him. She can't—"He is wet to the skin and will certainly get his death of cold. Something must be done"—and she does it.

She goes down to her forlorn and water-soaked "Napoleon" and asks him to come in out of the rain. She is very sorry and it's all her fault. He comes in as quick as his stiffened and aching joints will permit him. They kiss and make up, even as you and I, and there's an end to it. The clock in the steeple strikes three; he looks at his watch, "Yes, three o'clock in the morning." They kiss again and he makes tracks for home and a change of clothing, and so happily endeth a lovers' quarrel. How foolish it all seems. But, after all, isn't it true?

to disguise as Nellie's mother and is to bring "Cayuse" to time. The outfit is obtained and the big cowpuncher, arrayed in the feminine wig and skirts, would send any man's heart to his throat if he thought of having trouble with her.

That evening when "Cayuse" returns he is even more fretful than before. He does not make much headway, however, before "Mother" puts in an appearance.

The following scenes are extremely funny. "Cayuse" is made to perform all sorts of stunts in the kitchen, and once, when he balks, finds a big "forty-four thrust under his nose. In the end he is forced to sign a pledge in which he promises not to abuse his wife under penalty of being shot by any one of Nellie's friends.

"Now, kiss your mother-in-law," says Pete, but when he feels the rough cheek he grabs for his pistol, at the same time reaching for Pete's wig. Pete is too quick for him, and the pistol drops from "Cayuse's" hand.

However, "Cayuse" is cured, and when the film closes we have the intimation that "they lived happily ever afterward."

LUBIN MFG. CO.

"LIZ'S CAREER."—Liz was a country girl, and, it must be confessed, something of a hoyden. Her high spirits attracted the attention of Deacon Slocum who held one of the good, old-fashioned mortgages on the dear old homestead and who threatened to foreclose unless Liz would consent to become Mrs. Slocum III. Liz didn't want to become a first wife, let alone a third, and there was something about the Deacon's face she didn't like, so she told him "No" with considerable emphasis and went to the country to earn the money with which to pay off the mortgage. She got a job quickly, but she lost it with even greater rapidity and an amusing succession of jobs appeared to be greased she lost them with such startling rapidity. It began to look as though Liz's chances of raising the mortgage were similar to those of a snowball in certain localities when the bill board announcing amateur night caught her eye. Liz entered the contest and did her very best. Her very best was so exquisitely bad that they thought she was about the best "rube comedienne" ever. There was a music hall manager present and he not only gave Liz a job, but offered her a lot of money before he found out that she wasn't a clever actress, but the greenhorn he thought she was pretending to be. For two months Liiz was the rage and when she went home and the Deacon came with the mortgage Liz had more than enough to pay him and he was foiled again. It's a great little farce played with sprightliness.

"THE CLOWN AND THE MINISTER."—The noisy hotel was no place for a sick child, and when the little troupe of barn-stormers came to Stanton's Hole the Minister suggested to the Clown that he bring the little one to the modest parsonage where the quiet would benefit the tiny sufferer. It was hard to leave the baby and assume the motley but Blanco was the star of the troupe and his presence was necessary. Reluctantly he turned away and the audience never dreamed of the aching heart that beat beneath the highly colored costume. Then came the crisis of the fever and the distracted mother sent for her husband. There was still another turn to give, but paternal love was stronger than sense of duty and the clown rushed to the bedside, where presently the child lay in his strong arms and dropped off into the sleep that, if continued for an hour, meant recovery. Blanco did not dare move when the manager sent for him, but there was the hint that if he did not go the cowboys would come after him and the noise would rouse the baby's slumber and sound her death knell. But there was one hope. The minister might assume the garb of the clown and hold them off for a time. It was risky in a country where human life is held cheaply, but he did not falter. The precious hour was gained and the child, now on her way to recovery, smiled upon the deputation of cowboys who filed into the room while Minister and Clown alike gave thanks.

G. MELIES.

"OUT FOR MISCHIEF."—The natural child seems to be made up of one-third spiritual, one-third human, and the other third mischief; just mischief. If we see them any other way we are always afraid there is something the matter with them or they will certainly die young. There is always something interesting and refreshing about a perfectly natural child that seems to win us every time and we always like to see them.

In this picture we enjoy a rare treat when the two youngsters who start out on a campaign of childish pranks appear upon the scene with a couple of cans of paint and a brush and make up their minds to do things and put a little life and color into them. They enter the dining-room and show their artistic skill by putting a moustache and goatee on grandma's portrait.

Then they saunter out into the garden and paint the sweat-bands of the hats of two visitors; then, in search of other fields to conquer, they transform the baby into a real live darkey to the astonishment of the nurse and her "feller" the "cop." Hiding behind the garden bench on which their big sister and her beau are seated, they watch their chance to exercise their sense of the humorous and get it just as the two lovers are about to kiss by placing a piece of sticky fly-paper between the impending smack and they are immediately stuck on each other and their lips become glued together.

They put frogs in the soup, and when the two visitors with the painted sweat-bands come to dine the host and hostess are astonished to see black streaks encircling their foreheads. They are equally surprised and shocked when they behold the portrait of grandmother with whiskers, have a good laugh and sit down to dine. The hostess begins to serve the soup and stops with a scream as the frogs appear in view. The housemaid tells them that their children are culprits, and it is not long before they are captured and sent to their rooms, but not for long.

They soon escape and proceed to get square with the maid by starting a blaze of papers in front of the door of her bedroom where she is making ready for bed, and she is very much disturbed, rushing out into the hall minus her wig, false teeth and plumpers. The kids run into the dining-room and hide under the table, where they are discovered and soundly trounced by their infuriated parents to the great delight of the guests.

"THE STIGMA."—A prisoner convicted for his first offence is liberated before the end of his term, subject to police supervision. He returns home to find his wife and children in great poverty, and searches for work in vain—his past is against him. Finally he obtains a job in a large factory, but forgets to report himself to the police, and his employer is informed and he is discharged. On his way home he succeeds in saving a little girl in the nick of time from being run down by a reckless automobilist. That night, desperate at the thought of the privation of his wife and child, he breaks into a house. In the darkness he knocks over a statue, and disturbs the owner of the house, who enters pistol in hand. He is about to summon the police to give him in their charge, but at that moment his little daughter steals in, and with a sudden cry of joy, she runs to the burglar, recognizing in him the man who had saved her life. Explanations follow, and the father, grateful and compassionate, is instrumental a few days later in procuring work for the man and starting him afresh in life.

"BETTY IS PUNISHED."—Those who know Betty will not be surprised to learn that she has to move. If she lived in New York we doubt if any landlord would stand her in an apartment for 24 hours; in Paris they seem more lenient. She has, however, at last to move, and such an event, as may be imagined, gives her plenty of scope for the exercise of her peculiar talents, and under pretence of helping her father and mother in the arduous business of packing furniture, we find her causing numerous dire calamities. As a final stroke of genius, she locks her mother in a closet which is to be lowered through the window, and when the men come to effect the lowering by means of ropes, she lends them a willing hand. A sudden jerk, however, drags her and one man out of the window, and both, clinging desperately to the slackening rope, fall with a crash to the ground on top of the closet. This article is immediately shattered into pieces, and Betty's mother emerges from the ruins to vent her just anger on all and sundry. Several passersby stop to aid her, the furniture carriers lay about them vigorously and Betty retaliates, but Betty gets a severe drumming from them all that will make her remember this removal for a long time.

"A SUMMER FLIRTATION."—Two chums, Jack and Jim, take a room together for their vacation at a summer resort, and both become deeply attached to Dolly. The story opens when they are both attempting to be her partner in a game of tennis, a problem that is only solved when her parents come along and ask Jim to accompany them for a walk round the garden. Jim, to find some excuse that will take him back to Dolly, pretends to hurt his knee, and as soon as the old couple are out of sight runs back in time to hear Dolly make an appointment with Jack for 8 o'clock that evening. To get rid of Jack, he tells him that Dolly's parents require his presence, and he then suggests to Dolly that he take her out for a row on the lack. Jack soon finds out the message was a hoax, and returns in time to get into the rowboat is about to start. Jim refuses to row and Jack prefers to sit next to Dolly. She, however, not wishing to get mixed up in a scrape, gets out of the boat, and Jim follows and makes an appointment also to meet her at 8 o'clock. Jack overhears this. Both lads depart to their room, and having over two hours to spare, decide to take some sleep. Jack wakes up at 7, and, seeing the boot polish, blacks Jim's face while he sleeps, and then returns to his bed. Jim wakes up later and the same idea occurs to him, and he blacks Jack's face. At 7.50 they are both up and laughing to think what a fool the other looks, not knowing that he himself is in the same position. They proceed separately down the street to Dolly's home, followed by crowds of curious persons and school children. Jack arrives there first, and Dolly goes into hysterics when she sees him, and her father ejects him down the steps, much to Jim's delight, who sees this as he approaches. Jim also then enters and is not recognized at first. He kisses Dolly, leaving black marks on her face, and at last is able to explain who he is. They give him a glass and, seeing his plight, he goes out swearing vengeance on Jack. They meet in their room, and with the aid of two friends, the beds are moved aside, coats taken off, and a fist fight commences. At this moment each receives a letter from Dolly to the effect that she and her parents are leaving next day for New York and that she has enjoyed her flirtation immensely. Finding out that they were about to quar-

"WERTHER."—The picture opens with Werther's first meeting and introduction to Charlotte at her home, where he immediately becomes infatuated with her grace and charm. Some days later at a garden party, a spiteful friend of Charlotte's tells Werther that Charlotte is already engaged to be married, and points out to him the engagement ring on her finger. Werther is disconsolate, but calls at her home the next day, where he meets her future husband, Albert. Then he sees there is no chance of his ever marrying Charlotte. The next scene shows us Werther sitting on a bench, and the wedding party passing by. They ask him to join in the festivities, but he refuses. Some days later he passes Charlotte's home, just as Albert is leaving. She asks him in and he takes advantage of the fact to tell of his great love for her. She is horrified, and flies to her room and locks himself in, while Werther almost knocks Albert down as he goes out. Albert's suspicions are aroused, especially when he finds Charlotte locked in her room. She, however, soon reassures her husband of her undying love for him. Meantime Werther returns home and writes an expressive note to Albert for the loan of his pistols, stating that he is about to take "a long voyage." Charlotte understands, and hesitatingly hands the weapons to the waiting servant at her husband's bidding. The servant returns with them to Werther, who dismisses him, and with his last thoughts of Charlotte goes out on the long journey from which no traveler returns.

This picture, though a tragedy, is most beautifully and perfectly acted, and will surely be appreciated by the higher class of audiences.

ers are made. The visitors are taken on a tour through the machine room, where skilled mechanics are working on various parts of the frame. Thence to the wood-turning room, where a man is busily engaged in cutting with a hand saw the mystic curves of the propeller. Next we see how the covering is put on the frame—laced on, in fact, with thongs stitched through brass eyelets set in the edge of the canvas and also through holes pierced in the framework of the ailerons.

Having seen the various parts in the course of construction, we are permitted to watch them assemble a complete machine, tightening the wire stays, fastening the little pneumatic tired wheels in place, mounting the powerful motor, and finally we have a view of this wonderful air craft ready to carry its human freight at terrific speed through miles and miles of space at almost any altitude up to a point where the aviator freezes in the rarefied atmosphere.

Then we are shown with what speed the machine can be dismounted and packed in four trunks for shipment. While thousands have seen aeroplanes in flight probably only a few are familiar with the seeming frail construction of these wonderful flying machines. In spite of their light construction, however, they are carefully made, as will be seen in this picture, and the proof of it lies in the fact that a man can project himself into space by means of a few yards of canvas and a wooden fan.

The picture ends with some marvelous stunts in flying by Mr. Ely and "Bud" Mars, the latter performing his hurdle jumping trick and taking several hair-raising dips which Hamilton made famous at the aviation grounds at Mineola.

In view of the widespread interest in aviation this film should be particularly timely and interesting in all parts of the country.

"THE AVIATION CRAZE."—Here is surely a film that will produce some of the largest, longest and loudest laughs yet heard. In the first film on this reel we see the real aeroplane constructed and in flight, while this picture portrays some of the most crazy stunts of an airship that the most diseased brain could possibly imagine. We will not describe them here, but you can rely that any audience seeing this will leave your house in a very happy frame of mind.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

"THE SANITARIUM."—Charley Wise with a Waldorf appetite on a beany salary finds himself growing unpopular with his landlord as well as other creditors. In fact, the sighing breezes seem to whisper "Charley, it's your move." So, together with Pete, his valet, they decide upon a visit to the country to spend a few days with the rich old uncle. Upon their arrival they find Uncle Jim and Sarah are just planning a trip to Europe, and the timely arrival of Charley renders it unnecessary to close up the home, as he is placed in full charge with faithful Pete as his assistant and Jim and Sarah are off for the other side.

Charles repairs to the race track and donates the remaining fragments of his bank roll—to the other man's better judgment. Pete hits upon a plan to open the palatial home of the uncle as a sanitarium and thus collect a few of the shining shekels that health seekers are always anxious to let loose of. Accordingly an ad. is inserted in the daily papers, a sign over the door, and the rooms all numbered in regular one per city hotel fashion.

The patients begin to flock in like children to a nickle shown. All sorts, ages, sizes, suffering from every known and unknown malady from Reno-tis to raving maniac.

Pete was collecting in advance and the place in a few short hours looked more like a castle garden or Blackville Island than a country home. The money was rolling in so fast that Chas. and Pete went into hysteria. Just then a telegram arrives from Frisco from Uncle Jim saying that Aunt Sarah had lost her necklace and was returning home that night to find it. To clear the house for her coming was no small job, and they encounter all kinds of trouble, compelled to return their money, which has a telling effect on Charles' ambitions. No sooner than this part of the program was completed a second message arrives saying the necklace has been found and they were off for Europe.

Charles had no time to rejoice over the finding of the pearls—he was too busy thinking about the money he had found necessary to return to his sanitarium patients.

"TWO BOYS IN BLUE."

A Wild-West Show—they stranded went.
Says Hank to Bill, "The army for us."
Togged all up in blue—with nary a cent,
Spoiling for Indian fight—or wild west fuss.

The lure of the white-top and the music of the band is food for the bronco buster and he is happy with the plaudits of the gathered throng. The grand entre is on and all is agog with excitement as Tom and Jerry cut their capers. Just then Sheriff Ketchem rudely announces he has an attachment for an unpaid feed bill at Hebron, Ind., and proceeds to "sew" the show up. So Bronco Bill's Congress of Celebrities are busted—broke and hard on the rocks.

Tom and Jerry reitre gracefully with their tools in trade—two saddles. But as the cook tent was one of the things Sheriff Ketchem had planted on, there was no sign of the forthcoming bean soup, coffee and—as well as other delicacies usually accompanying the cook's top repast. So the poor man's friend—the pawnshop—holds out its welcoming hand to Tom's and Jerry's saddles. The loan made—the boys are out to see the sights. But they cost money, and soon the duo are on the breakers again—when they are attracted to Uncle Sam's sign calling for recruits.

This seems to hold the key to the best excitement outside the rag and blue inclosure, and accordingly they are assigned to detachment that is detailed to put down an Indian uprising. The officer in charge soon finds he has found two real knights of the saddle and decides to send them scouting to locate the hostile tribe—they are soon surprised and find more real excitement than Bronco Bills ever dreamed of. The old water hole is destined to figure in operations, a message is received by the commander of the post that the men are surrounded and can only hold out six hours longer, signed by Capt. John Wells.

Upon receipt of the message the scouts are sent to lead the cavalry against the Indians' stronghold—desperate fighting and final victory, one that has resounded through the pages of history, and has made the army post memorable, and even to-day Standing Rock has become a landmark of the great northwest reservations. When Tom and Jerry are decorated with honors they plainly show that this world isn't so bad after all.

VITAGRAPH CO.

"BROTHER MAN."—At the club the young husband receives word that an interesting event is about to occur. Hatless and coatless he rushes home, and after watching and waiting learns that it is a boy. The doctor leaves the house and the happy father falls asleep in a chair.

A burglar climbs up the porch, enters the house and, coming into the room where the man is sleeping, holds him up and takes his watch, and, holding him at bay, searches the secretary and finds a roll of money which he readily appropriates. The young man tells the burglar not to disturb his wife, who is confined in an adjoining room. The thief asks what's the trouble. When told, his sense of manhood asserts itself and he gives back the watch and the money, takes a ten dollar bill of his own and asks the child's father to give the ten-spot to the kid with his compliments, and tells him he will try to brace up and lead a better life.

He leaves in haste, but is caught by a policeman just as he is stepping from the porch and is brought back to the owner of the place. He might have had the prisoner arrested and sent to prison for life, but, remembering the fellow's tenderness for his wife and new-born babe, he feels a responsive feeling of brotherhood which he cannot dismiss from his mind and awakens an interest in the other fellow who has gone wrong but shows evidence of being reclaimed. He tells the officer the man had called to see him on business and he had dismissed him; the officer begs his pardon and goes back to his post.

Overcome with emotion, the burglar cannot express his gratitude to the man whom he would have robbed. He grasps his hand and thanks him heartily for his kindness. The gentleman gives the fellow his card and tells him he will help him find honest employment and become an honored member of the brotherhood of man.

"ACTOR'S FIELD DAY."—It's more fun than a barrel of monkeys. Regular village "cut-ups" are those actor chaps and actresses. They don't keep still a minute when they get loose on the village green at the Polo Grounds.

The band begins to play and the procession starts from Madison Square in "buzz wagons" and keeps moving until they get to the grounds where every actress, actor and actorman in town passes in review before the grand stand of political and social celebrities there assembled. Here they come now: Eddie Foy, Bert Williams, Marie Dressler, Lew Fields, Marshall P. Wilder, George M. Cohan, Victor Moore, Jim Corbett, Tim Sullivan, Joe Humphreys, Emma Carus, Louis Mann, Terry McGovern, Annie Oakley, Irene Franklin, and—well, just watch them as they pass by and you can pick them all out.

This show takes in every show in Manhattan and the suburbs. There goes the wild men of Borneo in a Salome war dance. The phonie band is a close second. You can't hear them play any music because

THAT CHINK AT GOLDEN GULCH

A Chinaman's Sacrifice through Gratitude

This Biograph subject exhibits a phase of the Chinaman's nature that we are slow to appreciate. We are too wont to consider him the "Yellow Peril" without considering what good he may be worth. The story tells of the supreme sacrifice suffered by a Chinaman grateful for an act of kindness bestowed upon him by a young girl and her sweetheart. A dandified cowboy tries to separate the girl and her sweetheart, hence the chink keeps his eye on him. Later it transpires that the mail carrier is held up and the robber successfully eludes capture. The chink, however, suspects the dandy, and catches him red-handed. To effect his capture, the chink sacrifices his sacred queue with which to bind the culprit. This act makes him an outcast forever among his fellow-men. The reward he receives for this act he bestows upon the girl as a wedding present. Approximate Length, 998 feet.

A LUCKY TOOTHACHE

This is a delightful little Biograph comedy, proving that good may come even of our afflictions. The little school mistress suffers from toothache, and Tom, one of the cowboys, offers to cure her if she will submit to his treatment. This proves to be a kiss. Whee! but the girl is mad. She flies into such a rage that the toothache is forgotten. After the storm quiets, she is more reasonable and even grateful, and a romance is started that looks very promising. they don't. Annie Oakley gives an exhibition of fancy shooting and seh does it. Bert Williams and Billy Reeves in a sparring exhibition would make an owl laugh, and the "greased pig chase," just before the pie-eating contest—one was as funny as the other, and then you couldn't stop laughing. The chorus girls played the actormen, and they played them good and plenty, and there were many high balls caught on the fly by the girls in bloomers. Well, to tell you the truth, there were so many things pulled off I couldn't describe them all. Just get a look at his picture and you will get acquainted with the "profesh" and their doings.

"ON HER DOORSTEP."—A lover's quarrel. All about smoking a cigarette. She insists upon smoking if he does. He objects to women smoking. This is all done good naturedly until he tries to assert man's supremacy over women by taking the cigarette from her and throwing it away. She gets real mad now, gives him back his engagement ring and tells him to go. He does, but no further than the doorstep of her home, where he determines to sit until she comes to him and asks him to return. The rain is pouring in torrents, and every time she looks out the window she sees her lover sitting on the step, drenched and miserable. She orders the servants to drive him from the house. He is attracting attention and creating scandal. The hirelings go; the young "Spartan" bribes them to let him remain at his post, and they report to their mistress that it is impossible to get him to leave.

"What's to be done? It's disgraceful. I'll just tell mamma." So she goes to her mother and reports to her the condition of things. The mother goes down to the front door and calls a policeman, whom she asks to make the young man go home. The young fellow explains the case and the policeman simply laughs and moves on. Lovers' quarrels are out of his jurisdiction.

Mamma goes back to bed and tells her daughter she must settle it herself. The young beau holds the fort against all comers—milkman, butcher, baker, and all the rest of the early risers stop, laugh and go on their way, thinking him drunk or crazy, but the young man sits on. His girl is frantic, tries to fight against herself and forget him. She can't—"he is wet to the skin and will certainly get his death of cold. Something must be done"—and she does it.

She goes down to her forlorn and water-soaked "Napoleon" and asks him to come in out of the rain. She is very sorry and it's all her fault. He comes in as quick as his stiffened and aching joints will permit him. They kiss and make up, even as you and I, and there's an end to it. The clock in the steeple strikes three; he looks at his watch; "Yes, three o'clock in the morning." They kiss again and he makes tracks for home and a change of clothing, and so happily endeth a lovers' quarrel. How foolish it all seems. But, after all, isn't it true?

"THE LEGACY."—It came as a genuine surprise when old Mr. and Mrs. Jones inherited a large fortune with the distinct proviso that they occupy the swell town house of the deceased to properly sustain the social distinction and dignity of their acquired wealth.

With many misgivings and regrets they close the old farm house in which they have lived for over fifty years and start for the city. On the train they are very much "upsot" by the novelty of things. Crossing the river on the ferryboat, they are astonished at the skyscrapers which loom up before them and which they have a sneaking feeling will fall over on top of them. A gentlemanly stranger on the boat who volunteers some information is looked upon with suspicion by the unsophisticated couple, who take an extra grip on their goods and chattels.

In the great city at last, they try to find their way unaided to upper Fifth avenue, where the inherited mansion is located. Unaccustomed to trolleys and elevated roads, they decide to take "shank's mare" and go plodding on, followed by a constantly increasing crowd of "ragtag and bobtail" as they are passing through the thickly populated tenement districts of the west side, where they are greeted as "Rube."

Reaching one of the city parks, they seat themselves on a bench, heated and exhausted; in the cool of the evening they become drowsy and the old gentleman takes off his boots and hat, while the old lady removes her bonnet, and thus making themselves comfortable, they fall into a restful doze. Their slumbers are disturbed by a policeman, who awakens them, and after questioning them learns where they want to go, calls a taxicab, sends them on their way, and they are taken speedily and safely to their place among the upper ten.

They press the button and a stiff uniformed lackey appears at the front door and bids them enter, which they do with much fear and trembling lest they offend the gents in brass buttons, whom Mr. Jones wants to shake hands with and make friends, which friendliness is received with coldness and contempt. The old folks are disturbed and wish themselves back on the farm, where every neighbor around the place is nearer "'an a relation."

In the quiet of the elegant boudoirs they feel like cats in a strange garret, and don't know how to make use of the elaborate furnishings; everything looks so grand "they don't jest look like they was meant to be used, only admired, museum like." The maid and valet appear upon the scene and insist upon dressing Mr. and Mrs. Jones for dinner. Mrs. Jones is too frightened to resist, but Jones says: "By heck! I ain't no infant, and nobody has put on my clothes but my mother, and I can't so far forgit myself as to allow any other fellow to deprive me of my manful right as a natural and free-born independent citizen, and what's more, I ain't going to rob another feller of his manhood by allowing him to do it." The valet insists, and Jones submits with the remark: "I don't mind a little help, but it ain't my style."

At dinner the butler and servants await their coming. Mr. Jones offers to shake hands with the help, who stand as rigid and cold as icicles. When the old people are seated at the table they are waited upon like infants until the old countryman tells his wife: "They was bein' treated as if they'd reached their second childhood and couldn't feed their own faces."

The last straw comes when they are escorted to separated bedrooms. Mrs. Jones is snugly tucked in bed, and Mr. Jones is provided by the valet with a suit of pajamas, which he indignantly slams on the floor and exclaims: "Goshamighty! This is beyond all tolerance. I ain't never wore my clothes to bed yit, and I'm dang sure I ain't going to begin now. The old-fashioned nightgown is good enough for me and anybody else that's got common sense enough to be sensible."

During the night the old couple manage to have a little private conversation, arrange an escape from all this "pesky" style and nonsense, get their things together, stealthily leave the mansion and all its "vanity and vexation" behind them, and return to the old home, where we leave them located and thoroughly satisfied to be content in the peaceful enjoyment of all its blessings, quietly musing:

"What's the use of all this grand life and high situation,
With nary a pink or hollyhock a-blooming 'round the door?
Let's be content in our own life and station
Just where we've always been so happy and so poor."

"THAT CHINK AT GOLDEN GULCH."—Civilization has worked wonders for humanity, but like many other benefits it is bound to bring its drawbacks. The tree of civilization has borne luscious fruit, still there is the fungus. The fruit is the development of the mind, inducing higher endeavors, which efforts are nurtured by the soul. The fungus is the enemy of the soul; its root is selfishness, its branches thoughtlessness and greed. Charlie Lee, a poor chink, who is the hero of this Biograph story, is made to experience the strength of this disorder in the extreme. Having located at Golden Gulch as a laundryman, his old father is about to take his leave for his home in the Flowery Kingdom. Before going the old man warns his son to cherish his sacred queue, for should he lose that he would be an outcast and disbarred frob returning to his native country, which every Chinaman who leaves, looks forward to doing. His father gone, the chink feels very much alone and low-spirited, for though a saffron-skinned Pagan, his soul is white and red blood pulsates his heart. He takes up a basket of laundry work to deliver and on the road is made to feel the result of two thousand years of civilization, for while passing a gang of cowboys, they pull his pigtail, threaten to cut it off, and roughly handle him until rescued by Bud Miller and his sweetheart, Miss Dean. For this intervention the chink is deeply grateful, and when Gentleman Jack, the dandy, tries to cut Bud Miller out in Miss Dean's affection, Charlie, the chink, keeps his eyes open. Through this the Dandy and Bud come to blows, but are separated by the boys. However, the chink hears the Dandy threaten to do Bud at first meeting. The chink resolves to save his friend at any cost. The excitement at the Gulch is the repeated hold-ups of the registered mail carrier, and the effectual evasion of capture of the robber. A reward of $5,000 for his capture is posted and the attitude of the dandy towards the notice arouses the chink's suspicion, hence he follows him like a shadow. His efforts prove fruitful, for he is a witness to the dandy's operations, who, disguising himself, makes his way to a lonely spot in the road and holds up the mail carrier. At a distance he views the dandy change his disguise and lay out on the ground to rest and gloat over his success. Here stands the poor chink apparently helpless. He is unarmed and with nothing with which to secure his captive. There lays the dandy with his hands clasped above his head. All that is needed is a bit of rope. A thought strikes the chink, but what a sacrifice it means. A sacrifice which will make him forever an outcast. There is no other way, so whipping out a knife, he with one slash cuts off the sacred queue and binds the dandy's hands so quickly that he is taken into the camp before he knows what has occurred. After the excitement of his deed is over, the poor Chinaman then realizes what his condition really is. The reward he receives is made use of in an unlooked for way. When the sweethearts go to his shack they find a note which reads: "Missie Dean alsame Bud Miller too—Charlie Lee wishee much glad you two when alsame one. Hope take money for blidel plesent—Goodby. Charle Lee have went way." With the note is the bag containing the $5,000, but the chink could not be found.

"A LUCKY TOOTHACHE."—The title of this Biograph subject would seem paradoxical, but nevertheless it is true that an affair of the greatest moment came out of this case of toothache. Bessie, the new schoolteacher, arrives at the little Western village, and on her way to the school she meets a gang of cowboys, who having heard of her coming are spruced up and vie with each other in their attentions toward her. Tom, the "boob," is always frozen out, but manages to land eventually. Boxes of candy and other little offerings are bestowed, until the girl is seized with jumping toothache. Each one suggests a cure, but without success. The boys depart grief-stricken at their inability to relieve her suffering. Tom now appears and offers a cure. He leaves her a note stating if she will submit to his treatment he will guarantee to cure her toothache. She is in such agony that she is inclined to submit to anything, and so, though not knowing what the cure may be, consents. After great preliminaries Tom administers a resounding kiss upon her cheek. Fury! Bessie "goes up in the air good and proper," and is in such a rage that Tom thinks it best to "beat it." Calling the boys, Bessie tells them of Tom's act. The boys agree that he must suffer for the insult. Bessie tells them they must hang him. Upon this command they pursue and capture Tom, and placing a rope about his neck pretend to be about to dispatch him, when Tom begs that Bessie be sent for. When she arrives Tom insists that at her consent he did only what he promised to do in the note. The note is read, and the question put by the boys—"Well, is your toothache gone?" Bessie—"Yes." Boys—"Well, what are you complaining about?" So they leave Tom and Bessie to settle the matter, wihch they do quite amicably, and the bells are to ring out soon.

"THE MASHER."—It is tough to get the name and yet no part of the game. Poor Hiram didn't anticipate the trouble laid out for him when he and his wife went for a stroll in the park, she attired in a loud check waist. There has been a complaint sent to the police headquarters about an impudent fellow who had been annoying the lady visitors to the park with his intentions. Hiram, while seated with his wife, espies a very charming young lady paying him some notice. He thinks he has made a conquest and reciprocates. The madam catches him and a quarrel ensues, the climax of which sends Hiram to a different part of the park. After he has cooled down a bit, he realizes his fault and starts back to make peace. From a distance he sees the check waist, and making a dash for it gathers the wearer up in his arms, only to find her to be an old spinster, who has just been reading of the real masher, thinks Hiram he, and makes after him with a hat pin, calling for aid as she goes. By the time she reaches Hiram he is on his knees pleading forgiveness from his wife, who scornfully leaves him for another part of the grounds. His pursuers witness the end of this scene, and think it another case of annoyance, so he is arrested. Later the wife, not knowing her hubby's fate, returns to bring about peace. Here is where the real masher appears and forces his attentions upon the wife ,who calls for the police. The policeman tells her that if the masher is apprehended he will notify her, so when she arrives home she is met by the officer and escorted to the station house to appear against the miscreant. You may imagine her surprise when she is confronted with poor Hiram. She, of course, will not believe a word he says. Appearance are too conclusive, and so the poor innocent victim must suffer for the guilty.

"THE LOVERS' MILL."—In presenting this film we feel certain that we are offering a production which will please absolutely any audience because of the novel features introduced. Arranged through a very mediocre plot we have a series of remarkably beautiful out-of-door scenes and of exceptionally interesting pictures. Briefly, the incidents of the story show us the following events:

A country miller has several yokels in his employ as helpers in the mill. He experiences a great deal of trouble with them because of the fact that whenever his two daughters appear among the workmen his men neglect their work to pay court to the maidens.

After frequently harangueing his wayward daughters and finding no improvement in their actions he decides upon a more stringent manner of obtaining his desires. He obtains the assistance of several of his neighbors and upon the first occasion of finding his daughters and the workmen killing time he and the neighbors bind the group and throw them in the hopper of the mill.

They go through the same processes as are used in making flour from wheat and come out in the huge kneading bins at the bakery. Here, to the consternation of the miller and his new helpers, the granulated particles of the offenders collect into their original forms and the astounded old miller gives his blessings to the lovers.

The film is beautifully colored throughout and moves rapidly from one scene to another while preserving a perfect continuity of plot.

"THE THREE FRIENDS."—A great friendship exists between a cab-driver, his horse, and a pet dog, the first two being of rather advanced age. They are seen starting off for the day's work, and have not proceeded far when a party of four hail the cabman. He tells them that his horse cannot carry four, but his objections are quickly overruled, and in they get. While going up a hill the horse stops from sheer weakness, but the driver gets out, and after a lengthy struggle they arrive at the top. The strain however, has been too much for the old man, and just managing to get into the cab he faints away. The dog jumps on the box and cleverly drives to a hospital, where the driver is taken in, but there he dies, the strain having effected his heart. The acting of the dog is clever in the extreme, and the film should be in every theatre.

"THE ROMANCE OF A NECKLACE."—This film is a dramatization of the most interesting events in the life of Benvenuto Cellini, the friend of Francois I. of France, Charles the Fifth and Pope Clement the Fifth, and the immortal author of the statue "Persee," his masterpiece.

In 1530, in Florence, Count Giaccomo, his daughter Olympia and Cardinal Beppo, are visiting the studio of the famous artist. Olympia admires a beautiful necklace. Benvenuto, who secretly loves her, makes her a present of the wonderful work. Olympia is engaged to Pompeo, the Pope's jeweler. She returns to her home, where the young man awaits her. When he sees the necklace she has he immediately thinks his rival, Benvenuto, gave it to her.

Pompeo, jealous, swears to kill his rival. He pays assassins to stab him. But Olympia, having heard of the plot, informs her lover, who, in spite of the warning, goes out unattended. He is attacked, but he succeeds in getting away without harm.

Meanwhile, Pompeo goes to Count Giaccomo to tell him that Olympia has eloped with Benvenuto. Hearing this, the count and Cardinal Peppo take soldiers with them to Benvenuto's home just at the time when Cellini has found that there is insufficient metal in the molds and that his masterpiece is about to be lost.

To avoid this, he takes all the rich silver goods which are in his studio and puts them in the cupola, and the casting is completed. The "Perseus" is saved and promptly taken out of the mold. The count and the soldiers arrive just at this time. But Cellini does not lose his temper; he takes a hammer and says he will break the "Persee" if they don't stand back. They all go back, and, Olympia, arriving, explains to her father what happened.

The Pope is informed and they are all to appear before him. But Cellini has come with his statue "Perseus," which he offers to the Pope. The Pope, to reward the famous artist, gives the nuptial benediction to Cellini and Olympia, in presence of the confused jeweler, Pompeo.

Count Giaccomo, with his daughter, Olympia, and Cardinal Beppo, visit the goldsmith, who is at work molding the statue of "Perseus." Pompeo, the Pope's jeweler, and an enemy of Cellini, awaits the return of Olympia, his betrothed. The carnival. The masquerade in the Gardens of Boboli. This necklace can be the work of no other than Cellini. A traitorous priest calls down a blessing on the swords of the would-be assassins. Cellini at work on his model, which he proposes presenting to the Pope. Olympia warns Cellini of the plot to murder him. The attempt. Cardinal Beppo sends a messenger to the Count Giaccomo saying that his daughter has been kidnapped by Cellini. The goldsmith's studio is stormed. Cellini has just suficient time to finish his model. "Stand back or I will break this model which the Pope is now expecting." The presentation to the Pope, who gives his protection to Cellini and Olympia.

"FOILED BY A CIGARETTE, OR THE STOLEN PLANS OF THE FORTRESS."—Lieut. Brownlow, enraged because the Colonel's daughter prefers a comrade, Capt. Fenton, to himself, listens to the suggestion of a spy that he should steal some important military plans and cause suspicion to fall on Fenton. The spy drugs Fenton's liquor in a hostelry, and Brownlow breaks open a chest in the Colonel's room, takes the plans, copies them, and puts the originals in Fenton's desk. In order to appear at ease to those he meets on the way, Brownlow is smoking as he enters the Colonel's room. His cigarettes have an uncommon mark on them, and he leaves one there. The plans are found in Fenton's quarters; he protests his innocence, and the Colonel is persuaded by his daughter to call in a detective. The latter finds the cigarette, has a friendly smoke with Fenton, and finds his do not correspond. Meeting Brownlow, the detective furtively throws away his own cigarettes, opens the case before Brownlow, and feigns surprise at finding it empty. The other naturally proffers his own supply, the detective takes one and finds that it bears the same mark as the one picked up near the rifled chest. Later he sees Brownlow hand the plans to the spy, and recovers them at pistol-point. Dashing into the room where Fenton is undergoing court martial, the detective vindicates the innocent and accuses the guilty. The Colonel hands Fenton back his sword and consents to his daughter's marriage.

KALEM CO.

"FORTY-FIVE MINUTES FROM BROADWAY."—This is the title of a comedy picture which the Kalem people announce for Wednesday, Oct. 12. The humor centres around the experience of a typical New York commuter living "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway."

He decides to take a day off with his family when a telegram from his lawyer informs him that an important law case has unexpectedly been reached. It is necessary for him to get into the city with the least possible delay. He starts off with a rush, but from the instant he puts on his coat his troubles commence. The door sticks and he climbs out of the window, only to be arrested by a newly-appointed constable. When this tangle is straightened out he makes a rush for the train, only to see it vanishing in the distance. He then hires a hand car, which breaks down and leaves him stranded by the roadside. A weary walk to the nearest village brings him to a garage, where he hires an automobile. The automobile breaks down and he takes to a hay wagon. A wheel falls off the hay wagon and again he gets a lift in an automobile. This time he is arrested for speeding, taken into court and after being held up while a number of minor cases are being settled, he is let off with a fine, and then thoroughly used up and disheveled he lands in his lawyer's office to learn that his case has been postponed and that he has had all of his rush for nothing.

"Forty-five Minutes from Broadway" offers at least a hundred hearty laughs in fifteen minutes, and without a doubt will prove one of the most acceptable of the comedy offerings of the week.

"WINONA."—Kalem's big Indian picture for Friday, Oct. 14, is called "Winona," and again exemplifies the remarkable progress which has been made by the Kalem players in portraying Indian types. "Winona" is a young white girl who has been captured by the Indians at an early age and brought up as one of the tribe. When she reaches a marriageable age she is much sought after by the leading young braves, but has not made a choice when a young white trapper appears on the scene and recognizes her as a childhood sweetheart. The young trapper has no difficulty in persuading her to fly with him, but the bucks of the tribe are not so willing to lose their prize beauty, and an exciting chase ensues.

It is needless to say "Winona" is finally rescued and becomes the bride of her white lover.

"Winona" as a play is exceptionally beautiful in scenic surroundings and in photography, and will certainly make a strong appeal to lovers of this class of the moving picture drama.

Arnold Hall, Point Pleasant, N. J., will this season be fixed up for a regular motion picture theatre. For a long time this well known summer resort along the beautiful Manasquan River has been in need of some kind of an amusement place to afford the winter inhabitants some recreation. The hall will seat at least 300 persons.

Family Vaudeville Theatres Comply With Ordinance.

The members of the Chicago Family Theatre Managers Association met September 30 to take action on a notice sent out to 24 nickel theatre owners by the city authorities, ordering certain modifications in their equipment. The notice, which was issued from the office of the Commissioner of Buildings and signed by him, the Deputy Commissioner and the Chief Theatre Inspector, reads as follows:

"You are hereby notified to restrict yourself to the use of one set of scenery, same to be made stationary to the stage. All movable curtains and drops must be removed except the fire curtain, one olio drop and one white picture curtain. You must also have diagram of floors showing exits printed on any and all programmes as required by Section 316 of the Revised Building Code. Comply with this notice or within forty-eight hours of the receipt of the notice your house will be closed by the Police Department without further notice."

At the meeting already referred to plans were outlined for opposing the enforcement of the ruling, which is made under the understanding that these houses are classed as Class 4 theatres. A fund of $2,800 was raised by the managers to provide for legal and other expenses, and they met again the same day to take up the matter further.

Seventy-five of the vaudeville houses are represented in the membership of the association, but the order will affect between 175 and 200 houses which come under the Building Commissioner's ban.

Managers of these theatres declare that if this ruling is enforced 75 per cent. of these theatres will have to close their doors.

Deputy Commissioner Knight on being interviewed to-day (Tuesday, Oct. 4), informed me that most of the men notified have already reported at the office and signified their compliance with the order. No arbitrary measures will be taken in any case, but due compliance with the ordinance will be insisted upon in every instance.

A Word About Sidney, Australia.

Joseph A. Hayden, manager of the International Film Service of Sidney, Australia, spent a few days in Chicago last week on his way to London, via New York. Mr. Hayden recently resigned his position as manager of the International and henceforth will be the buyer for that exchange in the English metropolis.

Mr. Hayden was accompanied to New York, where several weeks will be spent, by Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Morgan. Mr. Morgan was formerly the Seattle manager of the Amalgamated Exchange of Portland, Ore., and he has been appointed to fill the vacant position created by Mr. Hayden's transfer to London. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan will embark for Sidney early in December, and he will arrive in time to assume his duties by the first of the new year.

J. D. Williams, who owns the Colonial Theatre in Sidney, and who is now building Colonial Theatre No. 2 in that city, is president of the International Film Service Co.

Mr. Hayden stated that the new Colonial will seat about 1,500 people, or 300 more than the older house, both structures being handsomely fronted, with tastefully decorated interiors. The shows in the present house are continuous, four reels being given at each, at 6 and 12 cents admission (three pence and six pence). The program is changed twice weekly. The same policy will be followed in the management of the new house.

Mr. Hayden informed me that American film is now being used much more extensively than the European product, and that comedy and Western pictures are in big demand. The product of every American licensed manufacturer is represented in the program.

Police Called Out to "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Joseph G. Rhode, manager of the Rhode Opera House, Kenosha, Wis., visited The Film Index office last week. He had nothing but praise for the excellent pictures being turned out by licensed manufacturers and laughingly informed me that he was obliged to call on the police to prevent the overcrowding of his theatre, when the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" series of films were exhibited. The following clipping from the Kenosha News of Sept. 28 describes the situation:

There are some things in which the people never lose interest and "Uncle Tom's Cabin" seems to be one of them. Last night three thousand Kenosha people saw the old slave play enacted in pictures at the Rhode Opera House and at times the crowd at the theatre was so great as to make it necessary to call the police to keep the people from overcrowding the theatre. This is the first time that the old-time play had been presented in moving pictures in Kenosha and the fact that hundreds of people were unable to get into the theatre for any of the three performances shows that this old play is still the biggest drawing card in American theatres.

A Specimen of Western Verbal Castigation.

It is only fair that a man should have a show for his "ante," and I suppose that friend Buckwalter, of "shanty" fame, would feel sore if I overlooked a bet. Of one thing he will not have the chance to accuse me, and that is, of not taking my medicine.

In the issue of Oct. 1, I had a short story on the history of a shanty in which "Buck" figured prominently. After its appearance in Denver, the following letter was mailed me:

If I wrote my opinion of you I would need a red-headed typewriter using asbestos paper. Don't you think it is bad enough to put brick walls around your treasures and then leave the windows and doors too small to get them out—I mean the treasures not the walls—without having any Scotch Oats Mick twit you about it The only penalty I see that will fit your crime is drowning. Of course, in your case I don't think I should try to use the water cure because you are beyond that. The next time I come to Chicago I am going to try to decorate your map with some of the ruby red "licker" sold by a mixologist named Davis. I believe the only way to keep you from writing things about me is to have you paralyzed. The idea of casting ridicule upon a pious young man who travels his straight and narrow path with religious rectitude is one I can scarcely conceive. It is like throwing stones at the good little boys going to Sunday School and I can readily understand you are one of the pirates who will hide behind a tree and cast rocks, as you did many years ago in the land of oats and thistle. And at that I am not sure they have any oats there and, if they do, they use most of it for adulterating the corn in making the broth that cheers as well as inebriates.

But such is fame Last week my name was emblazoned on the tents of the enemy at the expense of one Carl Laemelle. This week my friends come to the rescue and put my name in the village joke book. Next week I suppose it will be inscribed upon the minarets of the highest synagogues in the land. But I am going to get even with you before you die, because should I wait until after that event I might not have time to look all over Hell trying to find you."

Let me put "Buck" right in a few particulars. I am not Scotch, but I always remember that the Erse and Gaels are brethren. We never throw rocks in Ireland; just shoot off blunderbusses and swing shillalies and say things. Besides, we like to get paralyzed once in a while. As to the probability of finding me in the place hinted at in the close of his letter, it is very slim. But, in view of a remote chance of discovering me, I would advise "Buck" to quiz the gatekeeper of that abode and get a pointer. I am always careful of the company I keep.

Justice Lurton and Moving Pictures.

The "Popular Magazine" of Sept. 23 had the following interesting item on Justice Lurton and moving pictures:

"Justice Lurton, of the United States Supreme Court, comes from Nashville, Tennessee. One day just before the adjournment of Congress he met on Pennsylvania avenue in Washington Robert H. Watkins, a correspondent for Southern newspapers.

" 'Bob,' said the eminent jurist, 'I have made it a practice for several years to take my little granddaughter to all the moving picture shows in Nashville. The other day we started out to see all of them in this town, but there were too many. Let's go and finish up the list right now.'

"And they did."

FAMILY THEATRE, ADRIAN, MICH.

The Family Theatre is the newest and best picture theatre in Adrian, Mich., and its success, for the past two months that it has been running, has been so marked that plans have been already made to double the seating capacity. The manager, E. W. Simons, is an up-to-date hustler, who always aims at the comfort and entertainment of his patrons. His service, which happily combines both quality and variety, is furnished by the National Vaudette Film Co., of Detroit, Mich.

An Excellent Screen Coating.

I take pleasure in saying a good word for "Silvo," a chemical preparation of silver and aluminum for coating the screens of picture theatres. In this case I can write from actual observation and comparison, for in the private projecting room of the Kleine Optical Co., at 52 State street, I have had the advantage of seeing pictures run on the screen before and after the coating was put on. The pictures were so markedly improved, both in clearness, depth and lack of flicker, that I inquired the cause, and learned that "Silvo" had been applied. An examination of the canvas screen showed that the coating was hard and of considerable consistency, permitting the removal of dust with a rag without injury to the surface. Wood and tin surfaces can also be coated with "Silvo," with equally satisfactory results. The reader is referred to the Kurtain Koat Co.'s advertisement in another column.

interest was taken in the Edison storage batteries for railroad cars, both passenger and Pullman. John Hardin, Western manager of the Edison Company, contributed to the entertainment of the visitors and their ladies by running off several high class films that were thoroughly appreciated. One of the evening papers printed the canard that the members of the convention were much disappointed over the non-arrival of some Edison talking pictures from New York, and which they had been led to expect; but the truth is nothing of the kind had been promised and therefore could not have been expected. Most probably the reporter had fondly imagined, for his own sake, that the talking machines and pictures would have been on hand.

A. C. Roebuck, president of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Co., states that 11 out of the 12 theatres on the Colonial Theatres Company's circuit use the Motiograph. He also states that, if orders increase as they have recently, the company will be compelled to add additional space to the factory, which now occupies two floors in the Ruprecht Building, with a superficies of 20,000 square feet.

William C. Preller, the Des Moines manager of the Pittsburgh Calcium Light & Film Co., stopped over in this city last week, on his way to the home office, at Pittsburgh. Mr. Preller stated that he is doing very fine business in his section. There are no "independent" customers in the city of Des Moines, so Mr. Preller told me. The only handler of the "independent" product there started out to buy "independent" film, but soon found that he could not satisfy the trade with their output, so he gave up buying anything except junk and "cold" copies.

Miss Kathlyn Williams has been transferred from the Los Angeles stock company to the Selig plant here, where she is leading woman of the Eastern stock company.

C. Danielson, manager of the Home theatre, 3949 W. North avenue, called at The Film Index office last week and renewed his subscription. "I do not know how anyone in the picture business can get along without The Film Index," said Manager Danielson. He informed me that he was doing excellent business with straight moving pictures and illustrated songs. "I could not run anything else out in my locality, as they would cut my head off," said Mr. Danielson, in speaking of the licensed product. "My people will not stand for cheap vaudeville," he added further.

The Edison film, "More Than His Duty," released Tuesday, Oct. 4, has made a big hit in Chicago. This film subject has an absorbing story of Northwestern mounted police life.

Frank L. Hough, traveling salesman for the Edison Type B machine, left for Boston Monday, Oct. 3, to attend the Edison electric demonstrations in that city, lasting from Oct. 3 until Oct. 29.

E. J. Stanton, manager of the Vaudette theatre, Michigan City, Ind., visited the General Film Company's offices at 77 S. Clark street last week. Mr. Stanton informed me that he has just finished the re-modeling and re-decoration of his house, which was re-opened about two weeks ago. Manager Stanton expressed himself highly pleased with the service furnished by Mr. Van Ronkel.

A. Powell, manager of the Ideal theatre, Kokomo, Ind., also visited Manager Van Ronkel last week. Mr. Powell is a well known, hustling exhibitor, and is well satisfied with the receipts taken in daily at the box office. The Ideal theatre is a beautiful house and is patronized by the elite of the city.

I ran across Louis Brown, manager of the Pilsen theatre, 1854 Blue Island avenue, last week, and he reported excellent business. The Pilsen has been running for four years and has always used associated and licensed film. It runs the year around and always to good paying business. Ed. Nolan, the light baritone singer at the Pilsen, is very popular among the patrons of that house.

I interviewed I. Natkin, owner and manager of the Ideal theatre, 1228 S. Halsted street, one day last week. The Ideal has been running for two years and was the first picture house in that neighborhood. Mr. Natkin has always conducted it on strictly business principles. He was one of the first to recognized the drawing power of moving pictures by themselves. At the outset he gave cheap vaudeville a three months' trial, and then discontinued it. He found that good moving pictures draw the best people in the neighborhood, something he never could accomplish when using cheap vaudeville. The Ideal has never been closed a day since it was opened, and Manager Natkin is highly satisfied with the business since he confined the entertainment to moving pictures exclusively.

JOHNSON-JEFFRIES PICTURES LIKED.

After a long wait the films of the Johnson-Jeffries contest were shown at the Star theatre, Cleveland, O., last week. The pictures were a great attraction at the house, owing to the notoriety they had received in all parts of the country. Many of the old sports said that the training of Jeffries was the most interesting part of the films.

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"NOW SHE'S ANYBODY'S GIRLIE."—By Williams & Van Alstyne; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. A song on a new theme, handled in masterly style by these well-known writers. The slides are of the order that are becoming ever more popular and in demand—novelty. The clever ideas set forth in illustrating this song make this set of slides an extremely humorous and amusing one.

"LOVE DREAMS."—Words by F. J. Crawford; music by Henriette Blanke-Belcher; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. A ballad of the higher order, yet simple in construction. The lyrics are exceptionally good, and the melody is dreamy enough to suit the most critical. Unlike the ordinary love ballad, this selection has given the illustrator opportunity for many wonderful double exposures. The dreams are all portrayed in a more beautiful way perhaps than you ever dreamed of yourself.

Scott & Van Altena.

"ARAB'S DREAM."—Words by Jas. Snyder; music by Edwin S. Kendall; published by Seminary Publishing Co., New York. For this song is produced a set of slides that every one, old or young, will delight in. A set entirely different from anything recently produced in that the scenery is all real Arabian scenery, with its picturesque desert, its camels and its oddly dressed inhabitants. It is easily recognized as the "real thing."

"DON'T GIVE ME DIAMONDS, ALL I WANT IS YOU."—Words and music by Chas. K. Harris; published by Chas. K. Harris, New York. When Chas. K. Harris composes a song we are in the habit of expecting something very good. This one is no exception. "Remarkable" is the only word that can rightly express the impression these slides give one. Remarkable models, remarkably well posed, and remarkable stage settings and lighting effects make this set of illustrations the best the firm of Scott & Van Altena have ever put out. That is saying a great deal for song slides.

"RUBBER-NECKING MOON."—Words and music by Chris Smith; published by Harold Rossiter Music Co., Chicago, Ill. Slides—a moonlight set containing some of the most amusing novelties you have ever seen. They tell the story of the song by themselves—humorously and cleverly.

"IN ALL MY DREAMS I DREAM OF YOU."—Lyrics by Jos. McCarthy; music by Al. Prantadosi; published by Leo Feist, New York. A love ballad with illustrations of the usual high order of Scott & Van Altena.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"MY SWEET CORDELIA."—Words and music by Shepard N. Edmonds. This number is a pretty love song such as the house of Haviland knows so well how to make popular. The slides are posed for by colored models and cleverly depict the lover and the sweetheart amid beautiful surroundings. Simpson knows where to find artistic scenery for his pictures and he goes after it. In this set he certainly outdid himself, for these slides are above criticism.

"ONLY LOVE DREAMS."—By Edward Madden, author of "Starlight," etc.; published by Shapiro. This is a beautiful love ballad with a melody fitting for such a tender theme. Simpson has done justice to this song with a wonderful set of slides remarkable for their beauty, clearness and natural coloring. The young lady who posed for this set of slides is very beautiful and the scenery is extremely picturesque.

Levi Company.

"I'M ON AGAIN WITH MONAGHAN."—Published by Shapiro. A rollicking comic song. The biggest hit of the day, full of melody and snap; a truly fascinating, and most original and humorous song. Slides by Levi Co. are posed in genuine Irish costumes amid charming scenery, making an attractive set filled with comedy features.

"GOOD BYE, MOLLY."—Published by F. B. Haviland. A sentimental ballad set to beautiful melody, agreeable and haunting. Slides by Levi Co. characteristically portray originality and beauty in every detail. Photography and coloring are good.

ELECTRICAL TALK No. 7.

in Figure 9 the upper line wire becomes negative and the lower one positive, and the continued motion of the rotating magnet changes the direction of the flow of the current as many times per minute as the pole piece is rotated past the iron core.

Summary.

Electric current can be induced in a coil of copper wire surrounding a soft iron core by suddenly moving the pole of a magnet past the iron core.

The direction of the flow of the current in a coil surrounding a soft iron core depends upon which pole of a magnet is moved past the core.

By rotating a magnet past a soft iron core surrounded by copper wire successive impulses of current are produced.

The frequency of the reversals depending upon the speed at which the magnet poles are rotated past the soft iron core.

In our next talk we will further discuss alternating current.

THE SACKVILLE PICTURE HOUSE.

THE ROTUNDA.

TWO DUBLIN PICTURE THEATRES

The Sackville Picture House, 51 Lower Sackville street, Dublin, was opened on the 9th of April, 1910, by Sir Charles Cameron, C. B. It was the first of its kind to open in Ireland and from its inception has been an unqualified success. The theatre opens daily at 2 o'clock, and a continuous performance is given until 10.30. The theatre is furnished and equipped in the most up-to-date manner, and is situated on one of the finest thoroughfares in the world. The price of admission is 6d. and 1s.; this includes afternoon tea from the hours of 3 to 7 p. m. The program is well chosen and a large number of American films are included therein. A special feature is made of topical events, and the company spares no pains or expense to keep up to date in this respect. Most of the items of interest occurring in England or Ireland are presented the next day. The funeral of King Edward VII. was shown 18½ hours after the last scene at Windsor, the fastest time from London, where the films are producer, is 9 hours.

The theatre is conducted under the proprietorship of the Provincial Cinematograph Theatres, Ltd., 199 Piccadily, London, W. The managing director of the company being Dr. R. T. Jupp. The company will have over twelve first-class picture houses open before the end of the present year in different parts of the Kingdom. It has two in Dublin, open at present and a third one being built in Grafton street, which it hopes to have open by December next. These three houses will be under the management of the present manager of the Sackville picture house, Wm. H. Hirsch.

Another prominent Dublin picture theatre is The Rotunda on Sackville street, under the management of Mr. Jameison. The engraving is from a photograph taken at the time the Johnson-Jeffries fight pictures were being shown there. The Rotunda was formerly occupied by a dramatic stock company.

ALAMO THEATRE HAS BIG CROWDS.

The "Alamo," Atlanta's prettiest and most cozy motion picture theatre, opened September 26, to one of the largest audiences that ever tried to get in a theatre in that city.

The house, which is situated on Whitehall street, at the junction of Brown and Allen streets, has, perhaps, the best location of any theatre in the city. It is right in the heart of the business section and will draw from all the shopping districts, including the fashionable stores, on Peachtree street.

It is the purpose of the management to run two first run reels of pictures every day.

A SURE 'NOUGH AEROPLANE.

Levi Company Build an Airship That Has New York Public Guessing.

"What are they all gaping at, anyway† If one looks they all look in this city. Oh! I see now. Look up there, 'Bo," it's an airship. I wondered what they were all looking at."

"By Golly, you're right; it's one of them monoplanes. No! Hold on, that's not a monoplane, cause it's got two o' those sheets or wings or whatever you call them. That's one of them biplanes."

"Wonder whose 'tis. Bet it belongs to that fellow who flies over here from Jersey once in a while. Just like him to land on somebody's roof. But maybe it's Wright or Curtiss. Come on, let's find out."

These little snatches of conversation were heard around Union Square, New York City, last week, when Joseph Levi, of the Levi Company, slide makers, took some cardboard and wood to the roof of the building in which his office is situated and built himself an airship. Why the roof? Because New York offices can scarcely be adapted to house modern birds of the air, and this machine is the real thing—in size and appearance. So it was only natural that when this wonder of twentieth century science and invention was completed and placed so as to be visible from the street, crowds should gather and gaze skyward in wonder and amazement.

One might reasonably enough ask, "Since when has Joe Levi become an inventor?" Perfectly simple. Some kind of an air craft was needed to illustrate the song, "Come, Josephine, In My Flying Machine." Flying machines are expensive. Wood and cardboard are cheap; mechanical genius is a gift. Put the last tow together and what do you get?—an airship—almost.

BIO CARBONS

Common Sense

A tailor might make one coat to fit both Tom Thumb and Pres. Taft. It all depends on what you call a fit.

A carbon may work passably on a wide range of voltages and if you've never used BIO Carbons you might think you were getting good results.

BIO Carbons are made in two voltages. "BIO regular" for arc voltages 45 to 60 and "BIO A" 30 to 45. Every designer agrees that 45 to 60 volts is the proper one for best results, but there are a few who can't get it in their machines.

For them we make the "BIO A"—the best low voltage carbon ever made.

A trial of the BIO Carbon will give you a new idea of what a good carbon should be.

It has set a higher standard that is worth your efforts to reach.

Liz's Career

Liz was a simple country maid, almost too simple to come to the city and earn the money with which to pay off the mortgage in the short time allowed her, but she didn't know that and ran away from home to accumulate the cash rather than marry the antiquated deacon. She lost a job in a restaurant before she got it, and as a servant she established a new short distance record, but she blundered into an Amateur Night, and she was regarded as clever because she was so unconsciously funny. A theatrical manager gave her a job before he realized that she was not a professional actress, and he gave her professional pay so that she was enabled to get back home and foil the dotard deacon. It is a screamingly funny production and the theatre scenes establish a new mark for production.

HEARTS AND POLITICS

There are tricks in all trades, but in politics the tricks of all trades are combined. The reform candidate threatened to wipe out the long established machine, and the boss told of a woman to make love to the candidate and make his retirement from politics the price of her hand and heart. The promise was not to last over the election according to the ideas of the enslaver, but she lost out with victory in sight and the candidate asked the Boss "Who's looney now?'

AN HOUR IN A "PICSHOW"

The Man from Reno Marvels at the Things Which Get By on Broadway

By William H. Kitchell

DAN was a man from Reno. Incidently, he was a concert-hall proprietor in the town that never sleeps, and he had made enough coin of the realm during the fight excitement to enjoy a "first-run" trip to New York. What Dan didn't see in Gotham didn't amount to much. He had motored by "rubber-neck" behind fourteen different lecturers, and had been six times to Coney Island. In the natural course of events, he was inveigled one evening into a first-class moving picture palace along "Picture Row."

Dan liked the pictures, including the ones which began and ended with several holes and a rainstorm. He endured the travelogue, even though everybody else in the audience wriggled and squirmed until the last antediluvian slide slid through the machine. He joined in the chorus of the illustrated song, although it was "mushy" in spots, and he was no lover of overdone sentiment. But he couldn't stand for the vaudeville.

"By the eternal!" he exclaimed, when the second pair of song-and-dance "artists" had done their "turn" and another picture was "on." "And they let decent women in here!"

Which was saying something, from a man from Reno.

Is it the films which most need fumigating—or is it the so-called "vaudeville?"

But vaudeville "pays," say the penny-wise exhibitors. Vice generally does pay, until it is stopped by the police. There used to be money in the manufacture and sale of French novels, until Anthony Comstock got busy. Then there was trouble for somebody.

It has been said that vulgarity on the American stage, in an immoral sense, can be traced to the "Black Crook." This spectacular production was the forerunner of burlesque, and it was imitated so energetically that soon every city in the country had its "burlesque" theatre, where a man could sneak away from home for an hour of inane vulgarity from across the footlights. But this wasn't so bad, because, to use the language of the man from Reno, "they didn't let decent women in." No man would have dreamed of taking his wife or daughter to see the "Pell Street Gaiety Girls," or other productions of the class, as harmless as they were during the early days of burlesque. For soon the inane vulgarity ripened into frank immorality, and numerous voiceless "comedians" and soubrettes became famous on an infamous notoriety for singing suggestive ballads and in croaking "Frenchy" dialogue into the smoky auditoriums. And it "paid."

Then came the moving picture—the deathblow of melodrama and vaudeville. There was money in pictures from the beginning, but not for the managers who were forced to the wall by the success of "canned drama." There was a scramble to invest in a white sheet and a picture machine. The former manager of the "Gaiety Girls" put his money—or what was left of it—into a "nickledrome." The writer of sensational melodrama went into the dime-novel business. The stage mechanics went to work for a living. As for the "comedians" and song-and-dance "artists," most of them went back to the factory or the hod, where they became useful citizens for the first time in their unnatural lives.

There was no call for their return to the spotlight. The five-cent houses everywhere were doing good business on pictures alone. Even the legitimate vaudeville houses that wisely accepted the situation and included moving pictures on the programme, did well by the change. There was no howl from the capable vaudeville performer with a "clean turn," because there was always room for him. There was no newspaper agitation against the picture houses, nor no broadsides from the pulpit. Decent people enjoyed a decent show of pictures, or pictures and clean vaudeville, and went out to spread the fame of the silent drama everywhere. And the pictures paid.

But now! Honestly, Mr. Exhibitor, is there a picture house showing vaudeville, in New York or elsewhere, where—if you were a modest man with the right kind of a sweetheart or daughter—you would enjoy taking her for an evening's amusement? Is there a booking-agent who doesn't ring-in on you at least once a week, a fresh-acting cigarette fiend and a wooden-faced soubrette with a cracked voice and reputation for vulgarity that wouldn't be tolerated in an old-fashioned burlesque theatre? And you stand for it thinking that because the pair get away with a round of coarse laughter and applause from the unthinking minority of your patrons, you are showing "good stuff" and filling a long-felt want of the public?

Arn't you smoking the wrong brand of poppy-leaves? Aside from the not-remote possibility, in New York, of an intervention from Mayor Gaynor, there is a reaction due from vulgar song-and-dance performers and the like. One of these days a stenographer hired by some Ministers' Association or Vice Committee will be taking notes in your auditorium of the dialogue used in your vaudeville "turns." There will be meaty reading in the notes—and strong evidence for the courts. Is it worth while risking a "shut-down" on an exhibition of immorality which the majority of people tolerate merely because it is not prohibited?

What of the people who detest "song-and-dance" and "slap-stick," who are passing your "Picture Palace" and spending their good money in the "Nickledromes" further down the street? There is more good than bad in the world. And there are millions of American citizens and non-voters who have never seen a moving picture—and never will as long as "dark houses" and disreputable vaudeville stunts give the picture theatres a bad name in the newspapers and pulpit. There are more people who have never seen "canned drama" than there are who have, and you are not going to draw them into your theatres with a one-piece orchestra and rotten vaudeville.

Besides, if you have any patrons at all, you have a good proportion of "regulars," who come, day after day, to keep up to date with the new releases. Do they enjoy seeing a senseless "sketch-artist" doing the same "turn" without a variation for three days at a stretch? Would you?

A well-known booking agent for picture vaudeville sat next to the man from Reno, watching the "try-out" of one of his own clients. Dan got him into conversation, and he talked, unconscious of the fact that he was overheard from behind.

"Where do they come from? I'm a booking-agent, and I don't know. A young lady in a home-made dress and a baby-smile dropped into my office from a country town in Vermont the other day. Said she was head-soprano in a church choir, and wanted to make enough money in Vaud'ville to go back and hynotize the young minister. I telegraphed her folks, and the old man came down and yanked her home with him. He didn't even pay for the wire, although there were reasons why he might have forked over a hundred for a souvenir. She had a lucky escape. The picture stage is no place for a girl brought up in a white house with green blinds."

"No," replied Dan, who had had enough of the show. "Judging from the antics of the pair of galoots on the platform yonder, I'd be ashamed to have my jackass seen in company with 'em. They ought to be taken out and spanked. But, man to man," whispered Dan, confidentially, "ain't you to blame for shoving

FOLLOWING up the crusade started by the New York "World," the members of the Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York are urging the passage of an ordinance by the Board of Aldermen of Greater New York to provide a censorship for photoplays used by them. A public hearing upon the proposed ordinance was held in the Aldermanic Chamber on Monday, October 10, which was attended by about twenty persons.

Mr. John Collier, Educational Secretary of the People's Institute, under which auspices the present National Board of Censorship is maintained, spoke at some length in opposition to the proposed ordinance, pointing out the inadequacy of such a provision to the necessities of the occasion. Alderman White, who proposed the ordinance, Secretary Driscoll, of the Exhibitors' Association, and Robert Luce, attorney for the exhibitors, spoke in its favor.

The ordinance itself was in a very nebulous state and provided merely that three Aldermen should censor all photoplays exhibited in Greater New York, with a penalty of $100 in case any one should exhibit a photoplay not bearing the Aldermanic O. K.

When Mr. Collier pointed out to the Committee of Aldermen the difficulties of the undertaking they seemed to resent the imputation that they were not as able and competent to perform the work as the present National Censors. Alderman White, father of the ordinance, pointed to his record as a referee of amateur boxing matches to prove his qualifications and gravely explained that he knew that "a boxing match was a display of science, while a moving picture of the same event was a bloody and brutal exhibition."

As usual with "hearings" of this character, little was accomplished, and the attorney, Mr. Luce, gave the committee a good excuse to adjourn by offering his services to help them frame the bill.

OF course the adoption of such an ordinance for New York City will have no effect upon the good work now being done by the present Board of Censors; that will go on just the same. But the difficulty with the proposition of Alderman White is that it does not get at the root of the evil. He has a vague idea that something should be censored and he thinks it's pictures. The truth is it is the theatre that requires attention.

Secretary Donegan said that he represented 200 exhibitors, and that they want the Aldermen to prevent them from getting bad pictures. Yet not a baker's dozen of Secretary Driscoll's association are conducing their places on proper lines. How many of them have their places well lighted and ventilated and how many of them will reject a picture that is "off color" if they think it will increase the day's harvest of nickels?

New York exhibitors need something or some one to make them clean house. Eventually something may happen that will bring about the results desired; but the ordinance now proposed will not help them in the least.

THE thing for the New York exhibitors to do, in their association and out of it, is to work for the betterment of the picture theatres. They have not kept pace with the general improvement of the motion picture business in any of its branches. To-day the pictures are many times better than they were two years ago, and to-day the average picture theatre in New York is the same as it was three years ago.

In every other part of this country theatres have been improved and a better class of patrons have been gained, but the New York exhibitor is no better off than he ever was where the character of his house and his entertainment is concerned. He does not advance, he does not improve; there is nothing attractive or inviting about his house, either inside or out.

Nothing in the wide world impels people to enter some of the dismal, dark and evil-smelling places in New York called picture shows, except the very excellent and entertaining pictures—photoplays—that are provided for their use.

THERE is nothing seriously wrong with the product of the licensed manufacturers that an exhibitor need fear. If he sticks to that class of photoplays he will never be amenable to the laws regulating the morals of the community. He is not compelled to exhibit a picture not suited to his peculiar clientele, so he has nothing to fear in that respect.

But he is in danger of apprehension upon the charge of maintaining a nuisance and a menace to public health if he does not clean, ventilate and light his theatre.

On these points the laws and ordinances are plain and sufficient.

They should be enforced in New York.

THE Essanay Company has been more successful than most of those who conduct contests, in that its invitation has brought results and it has been enabled to add to the language a flexible and expressive term.

The trouble with most coined words is their lack of adaptiveness to the common usage of language. The various scopes and graphs do not lend themselves to general use and remain merely a common noun descriptive of a single object. The new "photoplay" is capable of being made to apply to most of the terms in use with admirable applicability.

The photoplay, of course, is the play shown in photography or a play intended to be reproduced by photography precisely as the shorter play applies both to the manuscript of a theatrical performance or to the acted production.

Naturally, the pictured production is shown in a "photoplayhouse," played by "photoplayers," in a "photoplay" studio and witnessed by "photoplay" enthusiasts. To reproduce the picture on the screen, a "photoplay" projector is employed, run by a "photoplay" operator employed by a "photoplay" manager, perhaps in the course of time incidental music will be announced as "photoplay" instead of dramatic music, and the "photoplay" critic will praise or condemn the "photoplaywright."

"Motion pictures" lacked distinction, "cinemetograph" was harsh and rigid, "kinetoscope" was in the same class, while "kalatechnoscope," "optigraph," and similar compounds wearied. "Photoplay," on the other hand, lends itself well to speech, is fluid of sound, flexible in adaptiveness and, above all, fully descriptive.

WANT PICTURES IN WASHINGTON SCHOOLS

A proposition to introduce motion pictures in the public schools is now on foot in Washington, D. C., Superintendent A. T. Stuart believes that such subjects as geography and history can be taught better by the aid of motion pictures than any other way. Like many other modern day educators, who have found the motion picture filled with that which is good, he has come to the conclusion that educational pictures speak more forceful than explanation. It also helps the teachers and more than interests the pupil.

If the pictures are introduced in Washington, they will probably be first used in connection with the mining and engineering courses in the high schools. From there, they will be introduced to the lower grades and finally reach the kindergarden. It is expected that those in charge of school affairs in the District of Columbia will urge Congress to make provision whereby motion picture machines will be installed in the different schools.

CLERGYMEN UPHOLD MOTION PICTURES

Rev. F. W. Hill investigated the motion picture shows of Rochester, N. Y., and at the meeting of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association, reported results on the whole quite favorable to the amusement. He said that it was rare that an objectionable film was shown in Rochester. Other ministers agreed with him in the main and the fact was noted that the picture shows tend to lessen the business of the saloons.

OAKLAND, CAL., TO HAVE OWN CENSORS

The city of Oakland, Cal., has a new ordinance providing that the photoplay houses be regulated by a board of five censors, which was drawn up by Attorney R. B. Gaylord, was recommended by the ordinance and judiciary committee of the city council.

The ordinance provides for a board of five censors, who shall have the power to prevent any film from being shown which in their opinion is in any way offensive. The motion picture men will be given an opportunity to appear before the police commissioners and plead their cause in case they should desire to when any film is tabooed by the censors, one of whom shall be appointed by the Board of Education, the Police Commission, the motion picture representative, the Child's Welfare League and the Building Trades Council.

EDGAR STRAKOSCH, OF SACRAMENTO, WINNER OF THE ESSANAY CONTEST.

Above we print the photograph of Mr. Edgar Strakosch, of Sacramento, Cal., author of the new name for the motion picture entertainment, and winner of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company's prize of $100 in their new name contest just recently closed.

Mr. Strakosch is the proprietor of two motion picture theatres in Sacramento, namely Wonderland on the Plaza and the Bijou, 420 K street. "Dreamland," opened by him in 1907, is said to have been the finest photoplay theatre on the Pacific Coast at that time.

Mr. Strakosch was born in Australia, was educated in Vienna, and later came to America where he entered the theatrical profession. His connections have been with the following operatic stars and with the leading opera companies: Sarah Bernhardt, Coquelin-Hading, Lillian Russell, Mari Aimee, Theo, Ole Bull, Metropolitan Opera Company and the Carlton Opera Company.

In an interesting letter to the Essanay Company, he says, in part:

"Until I read your Essanay Guide, an appropriate name had not occurred to me, as I gave it no thought. So most of the credit of "photoplay" belongs to you. I conceived the name going home on the street car and made an easy $100.

"For popularizing the word, it seems to me the quickest and most advantageous, is the use of the word in all your Guides, the inducing of the journals to use the same, likewise other leaflets that the various companies print, the articles and letters of the Motion Picture Patents Company. This will soon acquaint the showman with the word, and after he has adopted it, it will not take long before the layman will use it."

"HALLBERG" EQUIPS OPERA HOUSE, WOODBURY, N. J.

Mr. H. L. Wilkins, proprietor of the Opera House, Woodbury, N. J., called at the office of J. H. Hallberg, 36 East 23d street, last Saturday, and placed order for the entire electric and moving picture machine equipment for his theatre, including Motiograph moving picture machine, "Hallberg" economizer, two 4,000-c. p. flaming arc lamps and a spot light. Mr. Wilkins expects to have one of the finest and most up to date theatres in New Jersey, and will do everything possible to please his patrons.

A PASTOR'S OPINION

In a letter to the Yale Film Exchange, of Kansas City, Mo., the Rev. J. W. Coontz, pastor of the Methodist Church of that city, contributes a profound appreciation of the motion picture—the Photoplay. Nothing has been said or written that is so comprehensive, so illuminating, and the source of the expression must command respect. The Film Index commends the words of the Rev. Mr. Coontz to its readers, with the advice that they put them to the best possible use in their respective communities:

IN regard to my opinion of the Moving Picture will you kindly permit me to say, first of all, that I have thought of it in relation to art, as it preserves the best thought of a generation for all generations so that moving picture preserves the great deeds of one generation for all generations. It does for the deed what art does for the thought. The deed is the process by which the ideal is realized and as the moving picture preserves the deed, we have in it the vision of the realization of the ideal. Art will tell us at any moment what the ideal of a people was, and the moving picture will show us the advance a people has made toward its realization. Art makes thought eternal and the moving picture makes the deed eternal.

I have also thought of it in relation to the theatre. A great play is produced. The company is finally dissolved and the impression fades away. The moving picture preserves that triumph for all time.

On the other hand, it has a much wider mission than the stage. It shows us how the rose bud passes to the flower, the wild birds in their haunts and animals in their lair. It bottles up history, it shows us reality. It is the greatest educational movement of our time. It is the greatest citizen builder that has yet come to us. The book brings truth to our reason but the moving picture brings it to the sight, it brings it to the emotion. As truth must reach the emotion before it becomes effective, the moving picture strikes a most effective place.

If the churches are wise they will at once lay hold of it in the work they are called to do. We have had one in our church for six months and every day we are coming to see more and more the wisdom of the venture. As nothing else, it is helping to make our church a vital power in the community. Thanking you for your advice and helpfulness in securing for me films that were appropriate for the church, I remain,

Yours Sincerely,

J. W. COONTZ.

PICTURES FOR CALIFORNIA SCHOOLS

Prof. Charles Believes Pictures the Best Educator for Primary Students.

Under the direction of C. W. Charles, one of the most prominent educators in California, and connected with the school system of California for the past forty years, a plan, which, if properly carried out, will mean the co-operation of Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda and San Francisco, in the purchase and use of motion picture films for educational purposes in the public schools, has been started in this city. Charles, who has been county superintendent of schools, principal of the San Jose Normal school and government educational expert, is planning a series of lecture in physical geography, history and commerce and, with the aid of stereopticon views will present these at the different schools. His plan is endorsed by the board of education and work in this line, with his plans, will begin at once.

"Gradually we will have motion pictures in the schools," stated Prof. Charles, "and will use geographical views for the benefit of our pupils. We will then try to interest Berkeley, Alameda and San Francisco and, perhaps, will be able to form an exchange bureau, purchasing one set of films for exchange, and thus cutting down expense."

Prof. Charles is at present conducting a series of lectures in the Oakland High school on geography and commerce. He has prepared stereopticon talks on the Suez and Panama canals, the Oakland and San Francisco harbors, the development of the Sacramento river regions, and the physiography of California. He is also conducting class tours about the hills of this county. The educator plans, when the motion picture idea is perfected, to obtain some of the United States government films of scenery and interesting industries.

Similar work has already been started in the Piedmont school of this city by Principal Roswell S. Wheeler, who is using the magic lantern as an adjunct to instruction.

It is planned by Wheeler to start the motion picture innovation at the beginning of next year and, according to the educator, this means will prove an effectual aid in geography and history.

J. C. Blackledge of San Francisco is at present making a tour of Mexico and gathering a series of motion pictures. Should these prove satisfactory, says Wheeler, they will at once be introduced in his school.

Principal Wheeler, who before coming to Oakland made a brilliant record at the Washington Grammar school in Fresno, was the first teacher to introduce the stereopticon into Oakland's public schools for educational use. The money for the Piedmont school machine was gathered by the pupils at a garden fete, and according to the teachers at the school the plan has been successful. Wheeler has over 500 slides of scenery in foreign countries and, by their aid, while lecturing, impresses his pupils with names of places and facts in such a manner that they are never forgotten.

ELECTRIC PICTURE HOUSE A SUCCESS.

The Electric motion picture theatre on Pearl street, Beaumont, Tex., opened its doors to the public September 25. The house is the largest and best equipped in that section of Texas and Manager Theodore Clemmons has spared no expense in making it attractive and comfortable. Manager Clemmons will run only the latest pictures.

"THE INDIAN AND THE MAID"

A Romantic Western Pathe Subject

AMONG the announcements for future release of the product of the Pathe American studios, are two subjects—a drama and a comedy—that will prove of interest. Under the title "The Indian and the Maid," the Pathe players have woven a plot with an educated Indian for the central figure that is just a little different from previous subjects of similar nature and introduces some photoplaying of a thrilling nature. In the course of events the girl in the case falls into a river and is in imminent danger of being swept over the falls when the Indian, then but semi-civilized, makes a thrilling rescue.

The Indian is very much in love with the maid, and the old rancher, her uncle, decides to give the red man a fair chance to win her by providing him with an education.

In college the Indian chums with a young man who proves to be the lover of the maid. The Indian soon discovers where he stands and gives up the fight, returning to his people. Because of his adoption of the ways of the White Man the tribe disowns him and he wanders off to the river where he rescued the maid and there ends his career by jumping in.

As a comedy "The Motor Fiend" will arouse a few laughs. Among other things it introduces us to the "joy meter," a contrivance which registers the number of dogs, policemen, women and children the enthusiastic motorist runs down in the course of his joy ride.

In the photoplay the motorist purchases a machine and, after some unpleasant experiences, goes home to rest his shattered nerves. Falling asleep on a couch he has a dream and it is here that the "joy meter" comes in. As it all happens in a dream we have no authentic record of the "joy meter," but the number of casualties recorded were appalling. Fortunately for the victims they were all able to join in the chase of the motor fiend and assist in pitching him into the water.

CHAMPIONSHIP BASEBALL SERIES FOR 1910

Privilige Secured by the Essanay Film Mfg. Co.

HERE is another big scoop for the enterprising Essanay!

The National Baseball Commission has again awarded the Essanay Company the exclusive privileges of obtaining motion pictures of the Philadelphia Chicago World's Championship baseball series of 1910, the first two games of which will be played in Philadelphia. This is the third consecutive year the Essanay Company have made the world's series films.

Elaborate arrangements for obtaining the best views of the big games have been made. Immediately it was learned the Essanay Company had obtained the rights to film the games, several experts were hurried to Philadelphia to look over the field there, to erect camera stands and to make all necessary arrangements. Later reports from these men announce everything in readiness and with good weather the best success will attend them. It is predicted that even a finer film than the previous world's series films will be the result.

In an endeavor to lose not a single important episode in the entire series, there will be several cameras on the field in Philadelphia for both games. Arrangements have also been made to faithfully cover the rest of the series at the National League Park in Chicago.

All the heroes of the diamond in both the champion teams will be pictured in close up views and every feature which will go to make an interesting film will be obtained. The film will undoubtedly be the greatest sporting film, aside from the Jeffries-Johnson battle at Reno, obtained this year.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, was especially pleased when he learned the Essanay Company would again make the World's Series film, and said:

"With two great baseball films on our record the Essanay Company is exceedingly proud to announce its third, the world's series of 1910. The preliminary arrangements for photographing this big sporting event have been carefully made and not one detail has been overlooked. We can assure the exhibitors a truly great feature film in this subject."

Announcement of the release date of the picture will be wired to all the licensed exchanges in plenty of time for the exhibitors to be informed. The picture will be released immediately upon the termination of the final game of the series.

The Essanay's World's Championship Baseball Series of 1909 proved a record breaker and was commented upon by many of the daily papers all over the country. The "Chicago Tribune" (Oct. 20, 1909), prints the following concerning the 1909 series film:

"The moving illustrations at the Majestic this week picture the recent struggle for supremacy in our national diversion at Pittsburg and Detroit. With apologies to Messrs. Sanborn, Lardner and By Hek, it may be said that the most glittering feature of that conflict are reproduced showing Tyrus Cobb and Honus Wagner in embarrassing conversation before the game; "Babe" Adams warming up preparatory to his slaughter of the Tigers; Manager Fred Clarke and Hughey Jennings chewing gum and grass respectively; and divers other spectacular episodes in the famous hostilities. The Majestic's version of the game has much more action than the real thing, inasmuch as the art of the kinodrome genius despises less anything so conventional as a base on balls, depicting nothing less than a thrilling two-bagger or a desperate slide for home. Those who have not yet had a sufficiency of the sport will be entertained by this counterfeit, for it is clear and exciting and should repay the patience necessary to sit through the preceding numbers of the bill."

The following is from the Chicago Journal (Oct. 19, 1909), and is very complimentary of the Essanay Company's last year's film:

"The first run of the motion pictures, a composite of the important points of the world's Pirate-Tiger series, is being shown to appreciative crowds at the American Music Hall this week. In addition to showing lively turns of the games which again return to the National League a world's champion team, the films show individual attitudes of Adams, Mullin, Cobb and Wagner.

SCOUTING IN THE OLD DOMINION

Tom Moore Tells of His Travels About Virginia

SEVERAL weeks ago it was announced in the advertising columns of The Film Index that Tom Moore, of Moore's Film Exchange, of Washington, D. C., contemplated a trip through the South to look over the photoplay houses in the interest of better service. Mr. Moore was induced to tell the story of his travels for the readers of The Index, and we have the pleasure of presenting his first installment herewith:

Lynchburg, Va.

Three motion pictures in this city—Belvedere, Gayety and Majestic—two being Association and one Independent; business good and predict an excellent fall.

The Belvedere theatre is one of the most splendidly equipped and handsomely decorated to be found in the South. It contains a fine ventilating system, best machinery and a high grade film service. The proprietor, Mr. C. M. Casey, is a prominent business man of Lynchburg, and a gentleman of the first water and one of the genial kind that one likes to meet. The management of the theatre is in the capable hands of Mr. G. C. Parsons, a good fellow, well met, and very popular with the people, and of sterling business qualities.

A glance over the audience bore out his statement that the Belvedere was patronized exclusively by Lynchburg's upper ten. The entertainment consisted of two reels of pictures interspersed with songs rendered by Mr. Franklyn Wallace, lyric tenor, a performer of wide reputation and formerly with Alice Neilson Company, Anna Held Company, Yankee Consul and many other of the leading musical companies now appearing at our highest priced theatres. Mr. Wallace sings only two songs, which are of the better class and resorts to "spot" light rather than song slides. The quality of his voice is seldom heard in any theatre.

Mr. Parsons is one of the many who insist that good pictures and cheap vaudeville do not mix and adds that he does not think they are even distant relatives. He's in the "Right Church and the Right Pew," that's all.

Roanoke, Va.

There are four theatres in this city—three Association and one Independent. Business good in some, could be better in others. According to information received, it would seem that cheap and suggestive vaudeville had played its part here with one house, with usual damaging effect. The Electric Parlor, however, has always been an exclusive picture house, and has reaped the benefits to be received from this display of good judgment. Mr. Rockhill, the proprietor and manager, tells a very interesting story of how he obtained a position on Roanoke's main street years ago. In doing so he was roasted to a whisper by the newspapers and business men who looked upon motion pictures as a nuisance at first; but after persistent effort on Mr. Rockhill's part they learned to see his was a legitimate and clean entertainment and soon began to crowd his theatre, and he shortly was forced to enlarge to accommodate his audiences. It was only a short time before he was compelled to again enlarge his house and soon other business men erected theatres, one after another, until there are now four.

He further explained the fatal mistake others had made in using cheap vaudeville which nearly ruined the business.

Mr. Rockhill being an older man in the business and having acquired much knowledge as to the effect of cheap vaudeville "let it alone" and in consequence gets his usual large patronage. He is courteous to the people and seems to know every patron by name. By way of the usual courtesy I "doffed my lid" every time he bowed and it kept me so busy that I slipped away and returned after the show to conclude my conversation. He is to be congratulated upon his popularity, also the high standard of shows he maintains.

The "Comet" theatre is a new and up-to-date exclusive picture house, and like friend Rockhill, the proprietor, Mr. Weber—a successful business man of Roanoke—believes good pictures, good music and good songs to be preferable and the most wholesome entertainment for patrons. The Comet is a very cozy theatre, seating 250, and is well patronized. These exhibitors express a desire to co-operate, in order to protect patrons visiting both places from seeing the same pictures twice. Can't go wrong on that co-operation proposition, believe me.

Charlottesville, Va.

There are three theatres in this city—two being Association and one Independent. The presence of one Independent, like in all other towns visited, was due purely to avoiding conflicting with Association films, and invariably all anxious to take on the Association productions, provided they would be exclusive of opposition.

The Art theatre of this city is one of the coziest and most perfectly conducted that it has been my privilege of seeing; seating capacity about 300, having about 10 mezzanine boxes, nicely arranged for the accommodation of Charlottesville's society folk. Mr. A. D. Dabney, J. H. Montague, A. V. Conway and L. D. Boothe, all prominent business men comprise the Art Amusement Co., which operates this theatre. The management is directly left to Mr. F. J. Paoli, better known as "Doc" Paoli, who bears the title of "pioneer" picture man of Charlottesville. Every one in the town is acquainted with "Doc" and look to him for good shows—and they are rarely disappointed. I, personally, saw a picture in this theatre, as bright and fine as I have seen anywhere. Mr. Paoli uses the most expensive service in his vicinity. "Doc" says he knows he is on the right track in so doing, so he has pulled the throttle wide open. Keep on the same track, old pal—you're going some at that.

Down the street a couple of blocks I met my friend J. J. Leterman who conducts the Lyric theatre—a vaudeville house. John says business is big, and as long as he can obtain the proper vaudeville it will remain so.

The Rex is another using pictures and songs only and apparently is getting good returns. We had a meeting, after show hours, of the respective managers and exchanged ideas, told a few stories, and then made for the hay pile. A pleasant evening, indeed, and a jolly bunch of fellows.

Staunton, Va.

Staunton, like Charlottesville, has three theatres, two being Association and one Independent.

One of them, the Rex, conducted by J. J. Leterman, offers a high class, exclusively picture show, following the idea of the Art theatre, Charlottesville, and using service directly after them. The manager of this theatre, Mr. Sam Leterman (better known as "Little Sammy") is entirely pleased with business and the outlook for the fall trade.

Near by is the Lyric, a vaudeville house owned and managed by Mr. G. W. Mooney. Mr. Mooney uses a fairly good Association service and explains business has been very good, as the result of giving the people full measure and the best he can afford for the admission charged.

Richmond, Va.

Seven theatres here, five operated for white people and two for colored. Majority using Association films, as usual. All seem to be doing excellent business. Friday (amateur night) at the Colonial I saw an awful crowd waiting to be admitted—a very popular house with about 1,600 seating capacity, and putting up a great show for 10 cents, consisting of high class vaudeville and pictures.

The Lubin was doing well, while the Theato (using a cheap Independent service and a number of vaudeville acts), has room to accommodate a larger crowd than they are getting. My opinion, given without the slightest meaning of offense, may be construed from the following song: "Toot Your Horn, Kid, You're In a Fog."

The Rex theatre, the only exclusively picture house, operated by Mrs. A. E. Thorp, using Independent films, was doing a fair business, but according to the manageress could be improved with good Association pictures. Beginning October 3d we will supply this theatre the best Association service in Richmond. The owner, Mrs. Thorp, is one of the pioneers in Richmond, and a very agreeable lady of good business judgment—popular with her patrons and has a large following. She says, "politeness doesn't cost anything and to be nice is the cheapest sport in the world." No airship idea this.

Petersburg, Va.

Three theatres doing a nice business—all Association. Mr. T. J. Gaddy of the Cockade theatre, having tried out the Independent product, has installed a high grade Association service and expresses confidence in same to build up his business.

The Lyric and Virginian theatres are both very attractive and well constructed houses and are doing well.

Norfolk, Va.

Norfolk boasts of six well paying theatres. Five being Association and one Independent. The Wonderland, operated by Mr. Crall, is among the most prominent, and is attractively fitted up and apparently doing fine business.

Portsmouth, Va.

Three theatres—all Association—business was exceptionally good, having reached there in afternoon was surprised to see such crowded houses at the matinee shows. The Orpheum has a standing crowd, while the Palace and Dreamland were entertaining large audiences. They all seemed satisfied, predicting big things for the winter.

Up to this point I had received a large number of service orders, mostly from towns where I already had one customer, and invariably succeeded in gathering in the competitors of my customer, in order to avoid conflicting programs. Most all of them accepting my proposition as the only practicable way of doing business, and in

A CANADIAN RAILROAD STORY

An Edison That Will Interest Railroad Men

THAT Edison Stock Company which made an excursion over the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Pacific Coast left no stones unturned along the route. Already the Edison Manufacturing Company has released a number of Canadian pictures and there are still a bunch of good ones in the bag.

The latest to be prepared for early release is called "The Little Station Agent, a Railroad Story of the Canadian Rockies," and gives, besides, a panorama of mountain scenery, some near views of railroad operation.

According to the story two "brakies" are in love with the little girl who runs the station. One catches the other kissing her and plans vengeance. The two men board their train—a freight—and while climbing a grade they have an encounter on top in which the favored one is beaten into insensibility.

Fearing that he has killed his rival the other "brakie" cuts the train, letting the cars with his unconscious rival drift down the grade.

Eventually the girl gets word that the cars with her lover are running wild and in danger of wrecking the express. She gets busy; routs out some of the hands and rushes off to sidetrack the runaway cars. The switch is reached just in time and the express is saved, also the lover. Of course, the other fellow gets his when he comes in.

An enterprising camera man has managed to get a birdseye view of a brakeman uncoupling a car while the train is in motion. This forms one of the scenes of the picture.

There is plenty of action in this subject and some points about it that a railroad man might want more light on, but it will interest everybody.

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "THE LITTLE STATION AGENT."

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "THE LASSIE'S BIRTHDAY."

THE LASSIE'S BIRTHDAY.

A rather farcical comedy with some laughable situations will soon be released under the title above named. The several lovers of a very beautiful girl place their presents under her window upon the anniversary of her birthday and then await results.

The antics of the lovers are sufficiently ridiculous to be amusing and the story ends by the girl getting the fellow she really loves.

order that they start off rightly decided to return to the office for a day or two that the bookings might be properly scheduled, as only such an arrangement can successfully be done by one who has actually been into the field and met with the various moods and temperaments; but owing to the unanticipated rush of orders—and I may conscientiously attribute many to the page ad in the Index, for many inquiries positively referred to same—my resumption of trip had to be postponed until on or about October 17. I shall again endeavor to send you a few experiences and shall hope that they may be more diversified.

Concluding wish to say that the main characteristics that we may call "specialties" with this Exchange are:

First—At least 20 reels per week, and entire output, if necessary.

Second—In towns where two customers are served—both shows wrapped together as one shipment—but separately packed, thereby reducing the cost of express to each at least one-half.

Third—Posters may be forwarded along circuit by our arrangement with succeeding house, thereby, with reasonable care in handling, saving each exhibitor on poster bills.

Fourth—We take the trouble and save you the worry of keeping an eagle eye on your competitor to see that programs do not conflict.

Fifth—By co-operative business ideas protecting the patrons of both theatres served in one town in that they are assured of not seeing pictures in both houses of same subject—and as soon as they find this out—your business is going to INCREASE, BELIEVE ME.

BIO CARBONS AT ELECTRICAL SHOW

Used Exclusively at Edison Exhibit for Lamps and Motion Picture Machines

The New York Electrical Show, now being held at the Madison Square Garden, New York City, is of especial interest to those interested in the moving picture business.

As the importance of the electric equipment in the moving picture theatre is becoming more widely recognized, both exhibitors and operators embrace the opportunities afforded by the electrical show to get in touch with the latest development in machines and apparatus.

One of the most attractive exhibits, and one that is constantly surrounded by operators and exhibitors, is that of the Edison Manufacturing Co., which is showing its latest model "B" Kanetoscope with outside shutter, in Booth 49, on the main floor.

The Edison Manufacturing Co. regards the electrical show so highly that Mr. John Pelzer, manager of sales, is giving his personal attention to the demonstration of this exhibit, and no pains have been spared to make it significant of what may be accomplished in motion picture production by the best means in the hands of expert operators.

The well known Bio Carbon has been adopted exclusively for use in demonstrating this machine, and also for use in the various other moving picture machines in the building, which, by the way, are all Edison machines, of which there are four of the latest model "B" Kanetoscopes used in the Brooklyn Edison Co.'s exhibit, and one of the same in the concert hall where the management of the electrical show is operating a continuous moving picture performance for the delectation of their patrons.

The Improved Model Type "B" embodies all the desirable features found in previous models, but has been materially strengthened in those points subjected to the greatest wear, and especial pains have been taken to produce a machine which will eliminate the troubles heretofore encountered in motion picture production.

The revolving shutter is of new design, based upon scientific principles which have heretofore not been sufficiently recognized, and eliminates the objectionable flicker which has previously been a great handicap in the production of really artistic pictures.

This machine has ben designed with special reference to ease of operation and manipulation, and a number of expensive improvements have been added to the mechanism.

Mr. Pelzer has made a special effort to see that the demonstration in Booth 49 embodies the highest perfection in motion picture production, even to those details, which are not generally regarded as immediately accessory to the machine, and has selected the Bio Carbon for this exhibition on account of the exceptional whiteness and steadiness of the light, and the excellent manner in which details are brought out to produce an artistic and life-like picture.

The condensing lenses are of the standard quality furnished in Edison machines, and are prepared by one of the most famous lens manufacturers in France.

Altogether this exhibit will be a revelation to the public in general of the perfection that may be obtained in motion picture production, and operators and exhibitors will find many points of interest that will repay close and careful observation.

TO BUY DUPONT BLOCK FOR THEATRE.

If the plans of J. A. Porcheon, of Hartford, Conn., go through, he will, within the next few days, be the purchaser of the Dupont block, on Pleasant street, Springfield, Mass., in which the Bijou theatre is located. Mr. Porcheon has been negotiating with Mr. Dupont for quite some time regarding the purchase of the block, as it is his intention to rebuild the Bijou and make it one of the finest photoplay houses in the State.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

WHILE the "independents" keep up a constant hue and cry against the "Trust," as they are pleased to call the organization of licensed manufacturers, an occasional glance behind the scenes reveals that the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company is formulating, adopting and enforcing policies which impose on new exchanges demands that prohibit them from engaging in the business. Here is a statement of the demands made on new exchanges, as taken from a circular letter recently sent out by the Sales Company:

"Any application for a wholesale contract for the purchase of films shall be accepted, provided the applicant shall execute our exchange agreement and place with the Sales Company a standing order for twelve or more reels per week, which standing order must become effective and shipments commence thereon within one week from date of contract, and the said contract be accompanied by a certified check for $1,200, or at the rate of $100 per reel, payable to the Sales Company, which amount shall be considered a permanent deposit to guarantee the acceptance and payment for the last week's shipments under a two weeks' cancellation, or for the last week's shipments under a cancellation for violation of said contract. The deposit to draw 6 per cent. interest annually."

Mark that twelve reels of new films at least must be purchased by the new exchange, at the rate of 10 cents a foot; also that a certified check for $1,200 must accompany the signed contract, as a permanent deposit with the Sales Company. The hideous "Trust" never asked its exchanges to contract for more than six new reels weekly, and a week's credit at least was always allowed them. Moreover, no deposit was exacted. And, furthermore, the licensed exchange was never required to "buy a pig in a sack," the owner was always certain of the quality and merits of the licensed product. No chances were taken by the licensed exchanges in any sense.

How is it with the new "independent" exchange man? He must trust to the tender mercies of the Sales Company, which knows full well, from the outset, that it is impossible for it to furnish twelve reels of new films weekly, or anything like that number, that will pass muster with picture theatre goers. But the Sales Company gets its victim to put a big stick into its hand; and, should he prove refractory, after learning from his exhibiting customers that their patrons will have none of such and such makes of "independent" films, his $1,200 is seized and he is left with the useless product on his hands.

It is idle to suppose, of course, that any sane man would sign such an agreement with the Sales Company, but is it not a good way to restrict the number of exchanges? How many "independent" exchanges, admitted before this rule went into effect, are buying twelve reels of new films per week? It is to laugh! Most of these men are renting junk, and chiefly junk, and are saving their faces by buying a few of the best films of the "independent" product. But the "independent" faction is so benign, from the manufacturer to the exchange man! They welcome the fool, who thinks he sees a fortune in the manufacture of "independent" film, because it brings grist to their mill, in the shape of fees and dues; and they pounce on the "sucker," who thinks he can rent "independent" film, because he is their only hope for disposing largely of their useless product. As for the "independent" exhibitor, he doesn't count for anything.

Now that the "independent" exchanges have succeeded in raising a wall against the addition of others to their number, it is in order to ask: "When will 'independent' manufacturers build their wall of exclusion?" But first there must be the expulsion of the undesirables, and what a merry fight that will be!

The "independents" are evidently a long way from the kingdom of heaven, which, in this sense, means peace.

Some Interesting Items.

The following suits were brought in the Municipal Court of Chicago, Oct. 6, and made returnable Oct. 15:

No. 189993. The Essanay Film Manufacturing Co. vs. William H. Swanson, for $412.97.

No. 189994. The Vitagraph Co. of America vs. William H. Swanson, for $983.99.

No. 189992. The Selig Polyscope Co. vs. William H. Swanson, for $928.17.

Pending at the present time, in the Superior Court of Cook County, Ill., is the case of the Edison Manufacturing Co. vs. William H. Swanson, docket number 272693, which stands for trial before Judge Moran. This suit was brought May 21, 1909, for $1,646.52.

Also on Oct. 6, 1910, suit was entered in the Municipal Court of Chicago, by the Selig Polyscope Co. vs. the 20th Century Optical Co., for $482.22. Robert G. Bachman, now of the great Western Film Exchange, an "independent" concern, was formerly president of said company. The American Mutoscope and Biograph Co. got judgment against the said company in the Municipal Court some time ago, for an amount over $500, which judgment has not been satisfied, so far as the records show.

The law firm of Cooney & Verhoeven, this city, has charge of all the cases enumerated.

The Motion Picture as a Benefactor.

It is refreshing to read, once in a while, a newspaper item that attributes good to the exhibition of motion pictures. A recent dispatch from Denver, that appeared in the news column of a local daily, shows how a youth in that city, seventeen years old, confessed a crime to a magistrate after seeing a picture that showed a mother's suffering when her son was apprehended for stealing money from the bank in which he worked. It appears that this youth of Denver had stolen $500 from the safe in the Hotel Victoria, where he was employed as clerk.

The motion picture helped him to confess, take his punishment and begin life anew.

But the picture may serve in other ways that will commend it, outside of its mission as an entertainer and educator, as the following excerpt from a Pittsburg exchange of recent date will show:

A photographic film showing a little girl romping with a man in a woodland scene, exhibited in a motion picture theatre, has convinced Violinist Jules Desterdecq and his wife that their little daughter, Georgette, supposed to have died last January in the Municipal Hospital of malignant diphtheria, is still alive.

Desterdecq, who is first violinist of the Pittsburg Orchestra, watched some new pictures being run in the Lyric Theatre. He was astounded to see what he believes to be the picture of his own little daughter playing with a strange man.

He staggered from the theatre. Later when another section of the same film showed the child more plainly he induced his wife to vist the theatre. Mrs. Desterdecq almost fainted, gasping "Georgette! Georgette!"

Both parents claim that the antics of the child in the picture are those of their Georgette, whom they were not allowed to see in her coffin, but who they were told had died.

Desterdecq appealed to Harry Davis, owner of the theatre, and secured the films which he claims may restore to his family the little one that they supposed had left them forever. The father has also appealed to the makers of the pictures to learn where they were taken.

Actor Cowboy Makes Trouble.

Arthur Chapman, in the Denver "Republican," voices in verse in rollicking cowboy tunefulness, the dangers of exhibiting a picture of a Western subject, in which an actor cowboy mounts "the wrong side of his hoss." The poem is so redolent of Cactus Centre that everybody will enjoy reading it:

MOVING PICTURES IN CACTUS CENTRE.

The culture game in Cactus has been boosted quite a spell
By a gent with movin' pictures—and he played the show game well;
But he had himself sure tangled, and the uplift game was messed
When he tried to show a drammer of the palpitatin' West.

The hall was filled with punchers when he tuned up his machine,
And showed us what was labelled a real Wild Western scene;
There was mountains in the background, which was real enough, perhaps,
But you oughter seen them actors that cavorted round in chaps!

We stood it without knockin' till a bronco drifts in the play
And the cowboy and his sweetheart make their weddin' getaway;
Then we groans in chorus mighty, and we turns just where we sits,
And it only takes one volley to reduce the lamp to bits.

Then we sought the frightened owner, and we paid the damage done,
But we cautioned him hereafter, nary Western film to run;
"Cause," we say, "it makes us nervous—nay, we may say, peeved and cross—
When we see an actor cowboy mount the wrong side of his hoss!"

Anent the Film Index.

The new dress of The Film Index, as donned on Oct. 15, pleased everybody with whom I have come in contact. There was one hypermodest feature on the front cover that several referred to and which, evidently, had been an oversight; that is, claim was laid to only 32 pages, when, in fact, there were 36 pages.

But The Film Index pleases its readers in many other ways than from the sartorial viewpoint. I had intended several issues ago to refer to the great popularity of the "Electrical Talks" by J. H. Hallberg, and to the wide interest taken in them by subscribers. I have made it a point to test exhibitors and operators, whenever possible, as to whether they are reading Mr. Hallberg's articles or not, and have usually been gratified with the answers made.

Here is a specimen of some of the letters received, and which was written by H. H. Colburn, manager of the Orpheum theatre, Burlington, Wis.:

"I failed to receive my last week's copy of The Film Index, No. 15. As I am following the different 'Electrical Talks' and manufacturers' bulletins, I sure want No. 15. Think the Essanay word great. Here's to 'Photoplay'! Hoping to receive my copy No. 15 in a day or two, etc."

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 7.—Electric current can be induced in a coil of copper wire surrounding a soft iron core by suddenly moving the pole of a magnet past the iron core.

The direction of the flow of the current in a coil surrounding a soft iron core depends upon which pole of a magnet is moved past the core.

By rotating a magnet past a soft iron core surrounded by copper wire successive impulses of current are produced.

The frequency of the reversals depending upon the speed at which the magnet poles are rotated past the soft iron core. In our next talk we will further discuss alternating current.

ALTERNATING CURRENT (Continued).

You have been advised in our previous "Electrical Talk," that alternating electric current may be generated in a copper coil surrounding a soft iron core, by moving or rotating a permanent magnet past the core. You have also learned that the current will be reversed, or alternated, more or less frequently depending upon the speed at which the permanent magnet is moved, to and from the soft iron core. This is the fundamental principle upon which an alternating current electric generator is constructed, and by modification of the number of rotating magnet poles, and the speed at which they are rotated, almost any desired frequency or number of alternations may be obtained.

It is possible by means of a simple diagram, or curve, to give a representation of the alternating current and your attention is called to

Suppose in Fig. 11 the distance from 0 to f represents one twentieth of a second. If we have a 60-cycle alternating current circuit, which would supply a load of 30 amperes, then if we close the switch at the instant the current is at zero and following the curve we find the current jumps from zero up to 30 amperes, positive current, then drops to (a) continuing downward, then Negative to 30 amperes through b, up Positive, down through c Negative up through d Positive, down through e Negative to f. Here we have in one twentieth of a second made three cycles, or complete reversals, and you will note that there has been three Positive impulses of 30 amperes each and three Negative impulses of 30 amperes alternately following each other. You can also not fail to observe that at the points 0, a, b, c, d, e and f, there is absolutely no current generated, neither voltage, nor amperes, because at that instant the current changes from one direction to the other.

If we had drawn the time line 20 times longer we would have shown just exactly what happens in a 60-cycle circuit during the period of one second. It would have shown 60 Positive impulses and 60 of the Negative.

Wherever the curve strikes the horizontal time line, at that instant there is no voltage or current generated therefore those points represent dead centers, as one might call them, and at those instants if a light is burning it is actually out but due to the glowing wire which carries the current or to the heated carbons of an arc lamp and the vapor of the arc; the glow is maintained, providing the frequency of the current or the number of cycles is sufficiently great to make the change undetectable by the eye.

You can understand that the more impulses we make in the period of a second the steadier the light will appear to be and that is one reason why with 133 cycles (16,000 alternations) an arc light appears to burn with a steadier glow than at 60 cycles (7,200 alternations) and still steadier than on 30 cycles (3,600 alternations).

It is a fact that it is very difficult to operate arc lamps on circuits of 25 and 30 cycles, because this frequency is very low and the interruptions are quite noticeable to the eye, especially on 25 cycles.

Some years ago those not interested in the electrical business did not use the terms "frequency and cycles" but the word "alternations" was used to express the rapidity at which the alternating current changed. For instance in the early days, almost all systems were made to deliver 16,000 alternations per minute. Later on the systems became 7,200 alternations per minute, and a few power systems were introduced operating at 3,600 alternations per minute.

On account of the many figures representing the number of changes in a minute and the comparatively long space of time of a minute, the electrical profession had, for a long time, used the term "cycle" representing one complete reversal of the current or one Positive and one Negative impulse, and if this occurred 60 times in one second, the circuit was said to deliver a frequency of 60 cycles per second.

I now call your attention to Figure 12, which represents a copper coil surrounding a soft iron core which is under the influence of a rotating magnet with one north and one south pole, driven by a belt or other means at high speed. Suppose the magnet poles N and S are involved at a speed of 3,600 revolutions per minute. There being 2 poles, one north and one south, the number of alternations during one minute will be equal to 3,600 multiplied by 2 or 7,200 alternations per minute would be correct for the current delivered to the line.

Suppose that in Figure 12 instead of driving the magnet at a speed of 3,600 revolutions it would be turned only 1,800 revolutions per minute, then the number of alternations would be 1,800 times 2 or 3,600 alternations per minute.

Let us take 7,200 alternations per minute and reduce this to cycles; first divide 7,200 by 2 which would equal 3,600, then we divide this amount by 60 seconds which gives us 60—representing the number of cycles per second.

Alternations.

To figure the number of alternations delivered per minute by an electric generator, multiply the number of magnet poles on the generator by the speed in revolutions per minute.

Cycles Per Second.

When the number of alternations per minute is known, the cycles may be determined by dividing the number of alternations by 2 then dividing the amount obtained by 60.

Summary.

The alternating current generator is an electric machine in which by the magnetism from rotating pole pieces currents are induced in copper coils, surrounding soft iron cores influenced by the rotating magnet poles.

An alternating current electric generator can be made to deliver a certain number of cycles per second with a given number of rotating magnet poles at a fixed speed. If the speed is doubled, the number of cycles per second is also doubled. The number of cycles may also be doubled by increasing the number of rotating poles to twice the number or the same frequency may be obtained by doubling the number of poles and cutting the speed in two.

Correction.

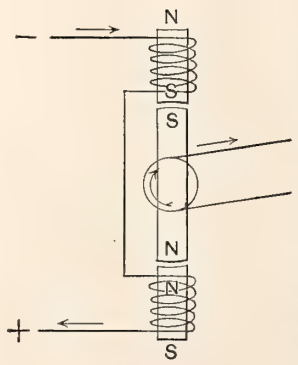

Fig. 9.

In Electrical Talk No. 7, No. 9 was printed upside down which has the effect of reversing the argument when reference is made to that figure. Fig. 9 is herewith reproduced. Cut it out and paste it over Fig. 9 in Electrical Talk No. 7 and the sense of the argument will be preserved.

"FRANCESCA DI RIMINI"

A Vitagraph Classic and Feature Film

IF anybody should ask you what is the most accurately and elegantly costumed, staged and acted motion picture play, don't hesitate to say "FRANCESCA di RIMINI." It is without question a work of art in its every detail; between genius and talent there is the proportion of the whole to its parts, a most brilliant display of marvelous beauty radiant with human interest.

It is a beautiful story, simply and clearly told; it all happened in the thirteenth century. Francesca is the daughter of Guido di Polentia, the Lord of Ravenna, Italy. Lanciotto (the Lame), a hunchback of Rimini, becomes enamored of Francesca, although he has never seen her. Her father secures her consent to marry Lanciotto, who sends his brother Paola, a handsome youth, to bring her to Rimini and arrange the nuptials.

Paola arriving at the Court of Ravenna, Francesca thinks he is Lanciotto and falls in love with him at first sight and he with her, but Paola controls his heart's desire by proving faithful to his brother's mission.

When Francesca meets Lanciotto she is shocked at the ugliness of his appearance and cannot help making comparison with his attractive brother, whom she truly loves, and, in fact, shows her preference. Lanciotto sees it and knows the reason, but persists in his attentions and intentions, and by the persuasion of her father Francesca is married to Lanciotto.

Just after the marriage ceremony, before the bride and groom leave the magnificent cathedral, with all its grand architecture, a messenger from the guards of the city rushes in and hands Lanciotto, who is captain of the soldiery, a message that he must join his regiment and be off to war. Ever faithful to the call of duty, Lanciotto takes his sword from the bearer of the message, gives Francesca over to the care of Paola during his absence and hastily departs.

Pepe, the jester of the court, heartily dislikes Lanciotto and readily sees the true state of affairs and never fails to mock and ridicule his crippled master. He is delighted when he learns that Paola and Francesca love each other and is constantly on the "qui vive" for evidence of his suspicions. The lovers, in the gorgeous gardens of Rimini, are wrapped in love's sweet thoughts and rhapsody, are irresistibly drawn into each other's embrace, kiss and stand transfixed.

Pepe, spying every movement of the couple, dashes from his place of hiding and hastens to Lanciotto's camp, running through wood and glen like a maddened hound. This is a wonderful piece of acting and panoramic scenic beauty. Pepe reaches Lanciotto's tent, informs him of his wife's and brother's unfaithfulness, only to meet the cripple's wrathful indignation and contempt. The shaft of venom has been sunk deep by Pepe into the heart of Lanciotto, urging him to mount his horse and gallop furiously in the midst of an approaching storm to his palace, there to learn the truth of the jester's report.

As the lightning flashes and the thunder roars he reaches the portals of his home, throws aside the curtains and beholds his wife in the embrace of his brother. With terrible denunciations and uncontrolled anger, he draws his dagger, raises it to kill, when a stroke of lightning, attracted by the glistening steel, glances from the dagger and strikes the two lovers dead.

The climax is a conception of dramatic art and inspired genius, sustaining to the end what proves the par excellence of the Vitagraph "Life Portrayals."

NEW PHOTOPLAY THEATRE FOR LIMA, O.

Work on the new photoplay theatre on Main street, Lima, O., has already begun, and it is expected that the house will be ready for occupancy by the first of the new year. Messrs. Louis J. Berger and T. P. Doyle, the proprietors, are sparing no expense in order that the house will be one of the most modern in the State of Ohio. When complete the house will seat 700 persons.

SYRACUSE HAS NEW STEEL PHOTOPLAY HOUSE.

The new photoplay theatre, which opened on South West street, Syracuse, N. Y., last week, is said to be the safest and most up-to-date house in the "Salt City." The building is strictly fireproof in every respect, being built in the first place for an automobile garage.

The house is of steel structure and is lined with brick and cement. Outside of the seats and doors there is no other wood in the building. It has ample space to accommodate at least 1,000 persons.

PICTURE OPERATORS MUST BE EXAMINED.

The owners of the photoplay theatres in Youngstown, O., held a meeting Oct. 4 with the Board of Examiners for motion picture machine operators. Under the new building code all operators of these machines must be more than 18 years old and pass an examiantion before a board consisting of the fire chief and building inspector. Chief Loller and Inspector Knox conferred with the owners of theatoriums last week in order to get an expression of opinion regarding the line of examinations, not wishing to work a hardship on men engaged in running the machines. No action was taken.

NO MORE VAUDEVILLE AT BRISTOL HOUSE.

Manager S. E. Sherman announces a change in the bill at the Bristol Opera House, Bristol, Ct., commencing this week. Vaudeville has been dropped and a new motion picture program has been arranged to take its place.

The motion picture bill will change every other day, on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, instead of twice a week, as formerly, and the best motion picture film possible to produce will be shown at this theatre. The illustrated songs will also be strengthened by doubling the bill. D. E. Inglee and a lady singer from Boston will give this part of the bill.

The change goes to even cleaner, brighter and more amusing shows at this popular playhouse at the old popular summer prices. Matinees daily and you may attend three times a week and see an entire new bill.

"THE RIVAL BARONS"

A Romantic Drama by Gaumont

JAS. S. McQUADE

THROUGH the courtesy of the Kleine Optical Company, at 52 State street, this city, I was extended the privilege last week of a special private exhibition of several fine Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse reels that will be released in the near future. I was especially attracted by "The Rival Barons," a compelling romantic drama by Gaumont, set in medieval times, the locale being laid in England, when "barons held their sway."

GAUMONT'S "THE RIVAL BARONS"—BETROTHAL OF MARGARET TO JOHN.

In the first place, I will say about this film that the forceful, talented acting done by the people who sustain the principal characters cannot but appeal to all who have a love for dramatic art. In this silent drama the mimic art of these clever people makes the story, the situations and the climaxes stand out almost as strongly as would the spoken drama. Eloquent and varied facial expressions, supported by corresponding phases of mien and gesture, combine to make "The Rival Barons" an artistic triumph of the pictured drama.

In the second place, the scenes of the story are well laid out and exceedingly well reproduced. Whether it be an interior or exterior view of a baronial castle, a glimpse of a courtyard in the same, or the picture of an old monastery of those bygone days, great care has been taken to be correct in architecture, tapestries and decorations. And the costumes, too, bear testimony to the same watchful care and fine respect for art possessed by the producer.

In the third place, the making of the negative has been marked by fine photography which brings out boldly many details which the educated eye will observe with pleasure. The film is finely tinted, which still further enhances the beauty of the scenes, the tinting being delicately and skilfully done, and, therefore, true to nature.

The chief characters in the drama are John, Baron of Northbourne; Arthur, Baron of Hartings; Margaret of Hereford, and Baron Hereford, her father. Messieurs Stievent and Harbay, prominent members of the Ambigu Theatre Company, Paris, sustain in order the first two roles; Mme. Celiat, a leading member of the Odeon Theatre Company, of the same city, appears as Margaret, and M. Gay, of the same company, as the Baron of Hereford.

The opening scene shows the betrothal of Margaret to John of Northbourne in the presence of her father, Arthur of Hartings, and a number of retainers. The master of Hartings shows with bitterness his opposition to the match, M. Harbay's clever acting in the picture making him assume a contemptuous air towards the lucky suitor and a firece demeanor that bespeaks dangerous enmity in the future. As John and Margaret go off together for a stroll through the Hereford grounds, we see Hartings hold a hastily whispered consultation with his followers and they also depart.

The following view affords a finely tinted bit of park scenery, and soon the lovers approach the point where Hartings and his followers lie in ambush. Northbourne is roughly seized and overcome by his captors, while Margaret is carried off by Hartings. This is done with a realism that excites the interest of the spectator to fever pitch.

The next scene gives a fine interior view of a room in Hartings' Castle, just as the Baron carries the fainting Margaret to a settee, and while his followers threaten with daggers the life of the struggling Northbourne. On recovering her senses, Margaret is given the choice of consenting to become the wife of Hartings or of witnessing the death of her lover. She elects to save Northbourne, who, in the meantime, is kept a close prisoner in a strong room in the castle.

Making a file out of his belt buckle, the Baron of Northbourne saws through the bars in a window of his prison and escapes; but his flight is instantly discovered, and he is pursued by Hartings and his band with drawn swords. The fugitive just evades death by reacihng the monastery, close by, and claiming the right of sanctuary from the Reverend Superior, the law of the Church at that time being powerfully enforced in such cases.

GAUMONT'S "THE RIVAL BARONS"—JOHN OF NORTHBOURNE SEEKS SANCTUARY.

GAUMONT'S "RIVAL BARONS"—CAPITULATION OF HARTINGS.

Soon afterwards, the Baron of Hartings dispatches one of his men to the monastery for a monk to celebrate his marriage with Margaret; and about the same time she drops a letter from the window of her room requesting the finder to carry it at once to the Earl of Hereford and advise him that she is a prisoner. John of Northbourne is shown the letter received by the Father Superior from the retainer of Hartings and immediately begs that he be permitted to assume the role of a monk and save Margaret. After long hesitation, permission is granted.

John first proceeds to Hereford Castle to unfold a scheme to the Earl by which the rescue of Margaret may be accomplished, and finds that noble distracted by reason of the note he had just received from his child. Summoning a company of his retainers, the Earl of Hereford accompanies Northbourne to Hartings Castle.

The final scene is a thrilling one. The false monk is announced and brought into the presence of Hartings and Margaret. His features are fully hidden beneath his cowl so that neither recognizes him. They stoop, hand in hand, before the private altar, when suddenly the supposed monk throws aside his religious garb; the door is thrown violently open, and the Earl of Hereford and his men rush in and force the capitulation of Arthur of Hartings at the sword's point.

The splendid acting and action of the drama throughout this film, which is full length, is highly accentuated here, the finale being invested with all the romanticism and realism of an old time heroic incident.

MANY NEW HOUSES FOR LOS ANGELES.

Rivalry in high-class picture show business in Los Angeles is becoming more pronounced and new theatre buildings are springing up like magic.

Within forty-five days Hyman & Prochuska announce that they will open two of the most elaborately furnished vaudeville and motion picture show theatres in the West. One will be the College theatre, to be erected on the lot adjoining the California club on Hill street, near the corner of Fifth street. The other theatre is now in course of erection on the southeast corner of Eighth street and Broadway. The former will seat 570 people, the latter 950.

The same firm announces that it will sign a long-time lease Oct. 10 for a lot on West Sixth street, between Hill and Broadway, on which it will erect a theatre building which will seat 1,200.

ANOTHER NEW HOUSE FOR NEWARK.

Frederick Kern is preparing plans for a large motion picture theatre building, which Dr. Bernhard Gluck will erect in Central avenue, near Warren street, Newark, N. J. It will be a two-story brick building about 50x100 feet in ground dimensions. There will be offices in the front on the second floor. The theatre will contain a large stage and balcony. Approximately $15,000 will be expended.

PICTURE MEN READY TO FIGHT.

Ohio Exhibitors Will Contest Insurance Rates and Express Charges.

At a meeting held at the Chittenden Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, Oct. 3, a permanent organization of the Exhibitors' League, composed of Ohio proprietors and managers of motion picture shows, was effected. An initial meeting was held Sept. 12 at the Southern Hotel, at which time a temporary organization was effected. The organization is the first of its kind in the United States.

Between 100 and 150 delegates were present.

In addition to routine business incident to organization, members of the league discussed plans looking to a fight against what they consider excessive fire insurance rates.

Temporary President M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati who arrived in Columbus recently, said: "There is no place of business better protected than the motion picture house. State and municipal inspections, coupled with any number of safeguards which the motion picture proprietor is compelled to place in his show, make the risk to an insurance company a good one."

A fight will be instigated against express companies, which, it is charged, seemingly have no fixed rates for carrying films. The question of raising the standard of motion pictures also will be discussed.

The Exhibitors' League is composed of picture show proprietors and managers, irrespective of their connections with the different film services. A general invitation has been extended to all the proprietors and managers of the 1,300 picture shows in Ohio to join the organization.

LECTURE WITH MOTION PICTURES

Rev. George A. House Believes Pictures of Famous Subjects Should Be Encouraged—Lecture on Mezeppa.

At the First Methodist Church, West Orange, N. J., last Monday night, the Rev. George A. House delivered a highly intellectual lecture on "Mezeppa," the famous tragedy written by Lord Byron. In order to give the picture a real life likeness, Mr. Church showed the Selig Polyscope film taken from the famous scenes of the play. Mr. House also used one of the latest Edison machines which gave the pictures a wonderful clearness.

It is the purpose of Mr. House to give several lectures during the coming winter. All his lectures will be depicted by motion pictures, which will be taken from educational and Biblical subjects gotten out by the licensed companies. Among the subjects Mr. House has in mind of showing on his lecture tour are "A Penitent of Florence," "Napoleon," "Judith and Holofernes," "Old Glory" and "St. Paul and the Centurion."

Since entering this new lecture field, Mr. House has found that he will meet with a large number of difficulties, as many people are against the motion picture and have yet to be educated to the importance of them. He also finds that the people who criticise motion pictures the most are those who have never seen inside of a picture theatre and some have never seen a motion picture. He says that after an audience hears a lecture and then sees pictures of the same, there is never any question as to the value of pictures.

Before entering the lecture field, Mr. House was a missionary in the British West Indies for nearly twenty-five years, and during that time he always found the best way to interest the natives in religious subjects was to show them lantern pictures and then explain them. He thinks the motion picture is a most wonderful invention and that it should be applied in places where it will do the most good, and for that reason he will deliver all the lectures on his coming tour in churches. Mr. House is a native of London, where he graduated from Harley College.

"THE EARLY SETTLERS"

Selig's Strong Story of Pioneer Days, Period of 1847

HIRAM BROWN and his family decide to emigrate to the West and cast their lot in the then almost uninhabitated country known as Minnesota, leaving their improvised home on the Ohio River. They started on their long journey in the old-fashioned covered wagon. Two months later they reach the Mississippi River, and being in the early fall the water was low and easily forded. Upon their landing, they camp for the night.

an attachment for one of Brown's daughters. A plan of complete capture of the family is arranged and carried out with all the cunning and fearlessness that characterized the American Indian of that period. They take their captives to the village, where they are tied to the stake. A trapper, taking his life in his hands, runs the gauntlet, mounts a running horse and hurls the Indian to the ground (a sensational scene in the extreme).

SELIG'S GREAT WESTERN PICTURE "THE EARLY SETTLERS."

Indians, not relishing the invasion of the paleface, watch them under cover of darkness, the Indian village, nearby, giving the family warning to move on; but this the sturdy farmer refuses to do, and is soon seen cultivating with his team of oxen. An Indian girl—a spy—under the guise of selling Indian wares, is admitted to the camp, and gaining the information she sought, reports quickly to her tribesmen, who resolve upon decisive action at once.

In the meantime, Spotted Eagle has formed

The young girl, who had previously warned the camp of an Indian uprising, is seen making her way to the military post to report the capture. When the soldiers reach the Brown camp, they find the lone settler that had made good his escape on the Indian's horse and who guided them to the village, where a spectacular rescue of the prisoners is effected, and again the settlers are reunited, thus completing a picture of daring and sensational features seldom witnessed in motion pictures. Ready for early release.

PICTURES OF HUMAN BRAIN

Scientists Look for Machine to Photograph Workings of Brain

Motion pictures of a human brain are fast becoming a possibility. According to Dr. Max Baff, a fellow in psychology of Clark University, the apparatus necessary for such work is now nearing perfection.

The discovery is due to experiments that have been concluded by investigators who have combined the X-raywith the cinematograph and have found that they can take motion pictures of the internal organs of the body.

Dr. Baff had declared that a scientist in Buenos Ayres is constructing a microscopic attachment for an X-ray apparatus and that this microscope will magnify to 5,000 diameters. In other words, by the application of this device to the X-ray and cinematograph, the brain cells will appear in action upon the screen and will be developed to 5,000 times their natural size.

"We are to take motion pictures of the brain in action; it is the next step in scientific development, and it will mean mercy and proper treatment for so-called criminals, justice for self-willed criminals." said Dr. Baff.

"By such pictures, taken at certain intervals, we shall be able to know to a nicety whether or not the child is fitted for the studies he is taking. But more important than this we shall know the capacity of the brain and thereby decide whether or not the individual may profit appreciably by a college training. For example, a person may simulate insanity so well that the keenest observer may be deceived.

"But the rush of blood to the brain in real excesses of insanity is altogether different in quantity from the rush of blood occasioned by the mental and physical strain of acting the part of insanity. Thus with these magnified X-ray motion pictures the man or woman who enters a defence of insanity for a crime will be subjected to a test that cannot be questioned."

VAUDEVILLE BARRED

St. Louis Judges Claim that Cheap Vaudeville is Harmful—No More for St. Louis

Every motion picture show in St. Louis will have to dispense with its stage or give vaudeville performances without an elevated platform, according to decisions rendered last week by Circuit Judges Sale and Homer. An appeal to higher courts is probable.

Judge Homer dissolved the temporary order restraining the City of St. Louis, Mayor Kreismann, Building Commissioner Smith and License Collector Alt from revoking the license and permit issued to the Independent Amusement Company (Washington Theatre) to operate a motion picture show with a stage at 4961-65 Delmar avenue. Judge Sale rendered a similar decision in the case of the Biddle Amusement Company, near Eleventh and Biddle streets.

The suits were filed last March to test the validity of that portion of the city ordinance which prohibits a platform or stage in motion picture theatres.

The subject is discussed in a brief filed by City Counselor Walther, as follows:

"There is also a moral side to the question which the Municipal Assembly, profiting by the experience of Eastern cities in the regulating of these shows, may have had in mind.

"The small investment required has invited many persons who have had no experience in furnishing amusement features to embark in the motion picture business. The price of admission usually is from 5 to 10 cents, and if, in addition to exhibiting pictures, the management also undertakes to furnish theatrical or vaudeville attractions the performers necessarily must be from the lowest ranks of the profession to be procured at the salaries that can be paid at the price charged for admission.

"It is a matter of common knowledge that the inferior vaudeville artist usually indulges in vulgarity to make up for his lack of talent. Owing to the fact that the price of admission would not permit the employment of a better class of vaudeville performers, the actors have been recruited from the ranks of the amateurs, and many boys and girls afflicted with stage fever have been enticed from other useful occupations and from school to become actors in picture-show theatres.

"The morals of young girls booked on the picture show circuit is not improved by their association with such actors."

REPAIRING ORPHEUM AIRDOME, JACKSONVILLE.

Manager Kalbfeld, of the Orpheum Airdome, Jacksonville, Fla., is making extensive repairs at that amusement place before the winter visitors begin to wind their way toward the land of palm trees.

The front of the house will have all new decorations and will be lit with hundreds of bright colored incandescent electric lights, while the interior of the place will be light enough to see throughout the audience.

Manager Kalbfield has made a big success of his motion picture ventures and his new photoplay house should be one of the interesting features for the winter visitor who is looking for a place to spend a happy hour.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

IF I should tell you, you can play better in the winter than in the summer, you would say, "to the nut farm for him." But it is a fact, not because in the summer you have that lazy feeling and in the winter you feel like working, that is not the idea at all. Again you will say, I am crazy when I say it is the manager's fault; yes (poor manager) he gets blamed for everything he does, his mind is so busily engaged at the box office that he forgets to oil his fans, and the (fall guy) the patron, upon entering the picture show is first under the impression that he has made a mistake and in his absent-mindedness has entered a machine shop instead of a picture show.

In these joints you will never find it to fail that the piano player in order to make himself heard must either play rag time through a picture or do a pantomime stunt at the piano. Then Mr. Manager, will call the musician on the carpet and ask him why he plays rag time through a pathetic scene.

The greatest point about playing appropriate music for pictures is to hold the audience, by this I mean to keep the audience so quiet you can hear a pin drop. Now don't tell me this is impossible, because I have played in picture houses from Franklin avenue in St. Louis to the best in the country, and have had an audience to work to, from a bunch of Greeks and "Wops" to the most exclusive set at Washington, D. C.

To begin with, you must have a quiet house. There is nothing that will appeal to an audience as quick as soft music.

I recall a time I was working in the best house in St. Louis and I laid off for a couple of days to study the conditions in the "joints," so I went down on Market street, and got a job at nine dollars a week, the most that had ever been paid on the street. The first night the manager came to me and said I could certainly play pictures, but he would have to let me go because they could not hear me on the street, "Canuamaginit."

That is the fault with the average exhibitor today; he doesn't want a piano player, he wants a Bally-Hoo.

I believe you will find conditions better in the West and Middle West than any other part of the country, and I lay it to the fact that the managers look after the show as well as the box office. In the Western theatres you will find that they have very little transient business, they naturally cater to a family business and are obliged to deliver the goods, as competition is very strong.

Taking this in consideration they have actually gone as strong as to pay a piano player "eighteen dollars;" just think of it (joke).

I find that the musicians in the west are making every effort to play the pictures and some of them are making a pretty good stab at it, but nine out of every ten are handicapped by a noisy house, the buzzing of fans, the rattle of the machine, and the conversation of the ushers with their friends in the back rows and still the manager wonders why his piano player does not make good.

At present I am playing at Dodges Theatre, Keokuk, Iowa, and I believe I can use this picture house as an example. To begin with, during a pathetic scene in a picture the ushers are instructed to hold all late comers to the rear of the house. The aisles are covered with a heavy carpet, so there is no noise from those passing in and out. There are over twenty electric fans running in the theatre during the summer months, and it is the duty of the electrician to go over them every other day to see that they are in perfect running order. I have played in this theatre for fourteen months, and I believe the patrons of the house are the greatest picture critics on earth.

The exhibitors over the country have had a very easy time during the infancy of motion pictures but the time has come when the public is demanding more than a flicker on the screen; the time is here when you have got to deliver the goods or get out of business, and the sooner the exhibitor recognizes the piano player as a feature of the entertainment the sooner the higher standard will be reached.

It does not take a renowned soloist to play the pictures, it takes what is commonly known as a fakir. My advise to a musician with ambitions to become a picture player, is, throw away your music, improvise, and study expression.

In my next article I will point out a few pictures of recent release where popular music can be adapted to the action, but they are few and far between. Popular music with a few exceptions can only be used with comedy pictures, while with dramatic pictures, you must either improvise, or give it up as a bad job.

"HEARTS AND POLITICS."—The best political story since the presentation of The District Attorney and one that holds attentive interest every inch of the film. John Daly has been nominated for Mayor on the reform ticket. The Machine, grown bold with a false sense of security, has exceeded all bounds and Atwood, the Boss, knows that his only hope is to tangle the reformers. He sends word to Sylvia Hartley that she must get Daly out of the way, and Sylvia smiles contentedly. Reformers are little versed in the wiles of professional politics and fall easy prey. A pretended accident in front of Daly's home as he is ascending the steps furnishes the excuse for an introduction, the more piquant because of its unconventionality, and soon Daly is madly infatuated with the pretty politician. She artfully encourages his hopes while she makes no definite promise, and a couple of weeks before election she declares that she will not consent to marry him unless he will agree to give up politics. He assents, and for a moment it looks as though the reform ticket would have no head, but in her haste to acquaint Atwood with her triumph Sylvia writes a note in Daly's office and does not know that she is using the top sheet of a carbon block. There are transfer sheets beneath and the letter is reproduced several times. These are found by May Belding, Daly's secretary, who is very much in love with her employer, and when the news of Daly's election comes he asks May to share his honors with him.

"HAWKINS' HAT."—Mrs. Hawkins is a perfectly good wife, but she will insist on going through Hawkins' pockets now and then in search of loose change and her ideas as to what constitutes loose change are liberal in the extreme. Hawkins knows her habit, but having been married some time he knows better than to start an argument. It is much easier to be diplomatic than debative, and when he comes home from a poker party with a wad of greenbacks that would make a square meal for a goat he hides his money in his hat and goes to sleep to dream of more jackpots. Mrs. Hawkins knows that he has been playing poker and she appoints herself an investigating committee. There are no results, however, and she goes downstairs to superintend the getting of breakfast. A tramp applies for something to eat and his hat is such a scandal that she gives him the old one of Hawkins.. Then the nominal head of the house comes downstairs and misses his hat. The tale of charity is told, and Hawkins sprints up the street. The tramp has sold the headgear to a second-hand man, so Hawkins loses no time in looking up the old clo' man and making a dicker for the hat. The vendor of hasbeens drives what he considers a shrewd bargain and Hawkins grabs the hat. When he snatches the lining out and draws out the roll of bills —well, how would you feel yourself if you were that old clo' man.

"ARCHIE'S ARCHERY."—He didn't look as though his name were Archie. It might have been Archibald, but they all called him Archie, and that ended it. Some of Archie's young friends were practicing archery and Archie thought he would try. He made a bull's eye the very first thing, and he got all swelled up about it. Right smack in the center of the inner ring, and he had never before snapped a bowspring! You can't quite blame him for getting chesty, but that was no reason why the accidental hit should have sent him out to get the practice that makes perfect. He could not know, when he aimed at the sheet on the line, that the wash lady was on the other side, but in a moment she knew that there was someone like Archie, and she went to look for him. There were others who came to a sudden decision that they would like to see Archie, and in somewhat of a hurry at that. Archie did not know this until it was rather late to make a getaway, but he did by giving the bow to a tramp, and perhaps one of these days Archie will figure as the archery champion and make bull's eyes that are not beginner's luck, and the result of shutting his eyes, just as he lets the bowstring fly. On the same reel with Hawkins' Hat, another dashing comedy, the release forms an exceptionally good subject in every way. These half-length comedies are appreciated by exhibitors, and this is as smart a combination as we have lately presented.

G. MELIES.

"UNCLE JIM."—Bill and Jim, young miners, two pals, are in love with the same girl. They have been comrades ever since they were boys. Bill is the favored one, notwithstanding Nellie has extreme regard for Jim as a good man and a true friend. When she accepts Bill and consents to be his wife poor Jim is almost heartbroken, but consoles himself in a consciousness that Nellie has chosen a good honest man who will do his best to make her happy.

As the picture progresses we cannot fail to see, as Jim gazes friendly at Nellie's photograph, that he still loves her, although resigned to her preference for his chum Bill.

Bill marries Nellie; they go to housekeeping. In due course of time their union is blessed with a sweet little baby girl, who, as she grows older, is taught to call her papa's good friend "Uncle Jim."

Every day Bill and Jim worked in the same mine, Jim on one shift, Bill on another. Jim, approaching the mine, notices great commotion at the mine shaft, rushes forward just as the bucket is brought to the surface bearing the bodies of Bill and his father-in-law, dead.

Poor Jim is heart-broken, sends word to Nellie, and after seeing that his friends' bodies are properly cared for, hurries to Nellie's assistance as she falls fainting into the arms of some of the men when she beholds the bodies of her husband and father.

Six years have passed since Bill's death and Nellie is still a widow, working very hard to support herself and her little girl. Jim tries in every way he can to bestow kindnesses and extend courtesies to Nellie and her child whenever possible. He brings the child a kite which he has made for her. The child goes out to fly her kite, running through the fields assisted by a boy friend. She falls over a precipice where she lies stunned and injured. The boy goes for help. Jim hears of the accident and goes to the child's rescue. The men let him down the side of the cliff; Jim tenderly brings the child safe to the top where she is restored to her mother.

"Uncle Jim" calls to see the little invalid while she is convalescing, and during one of his visits proposes to Nellie. She hesitates, but her little daughter, who dearly loves her "Uncle Jim," intercedes with her mother in his behalf, and it is not long before he is made the happy protector and provider of the widow and child of his old pal and dearest friend.

PATHE FRERES.

"ONE ON MAX."—This time Max appears in the character of a newly engaged man, dressing with particular care to make his official entry, as it were, into the bride elect's family. Unluckily his shoes are a wee bit tight. He resigns himself to a momentary inconvenience, and, putting on his slippers, sallies forth to purchase a new pair of shoes on his way to his fiancee's home. But, alas! for the constancy of man. Max is soon making love to the wife of the storekeeper, who, out of revenge, screws a pair of roller skates tightly on to the boots with which he is about to shoe his customer. Thus equipped, he pushes Max into the street, and his efforts to maintain his equilibrium, and to capture his silk hat, which has rolled off, make a sight worth seeing. Failing to get the skates off, he takes a cab, into which he is assisted by the driver. Arriving at his destination he makes a precipitous entry. Once seated on a chair he refuses to move, but is persuaded to take his place among the dancers, where his erratic movements cause considerable alarm. At last he relates his adventure, and amidst bursts of general laughter, someone suggests that the obvious remedy is to take the shoes off.

"OUTWITTED."—The picture opens with a stone quarry at which John Sanderson reports for duty as the new foreman, and asks where he can find room and board. The proprietor instructs Bill Adams to take him to Farmer Jones. Bill goes with him to the farm, and after the necessary arrangements are made, John is introduced to Sadie, the farmer's pretty daughter. This makes Bill jealous, for he also admires her, although she has no use for him. Two weeks later we see Sadie bringing lunch to John and Bill. While the former is called aside for a few moments by the proprietor, who gives him a check to get cashed at the bank, Bill makes advances to Sadie. She repulses him and he then tries to kiss her, but John arrives back in time to knock him down. Bill swears vengeance, and John, telling Sadie that he is afraid Bill will hurt her,gives her a revolver to protect herself with, and rides off on his bicycle to the bank. Sadie seeing that Bill mounts a wheel and follows, realizes that he means mischief, and also follows on her bicycle, and overtaking John, tells him of her fears. John cashes the check and straps the proceeds in a belt around his waist. Meantime Bill has gone to an old disused building and arranged with two outlaws to rob the foreman. Sadie, however, has overheard their plans and rides off and meets John. He hands her the belt with the money, and Bill, who sees this, rides off to tell his confederates of the change. They all three then gallop after the girl, but John shuts the crossing gate behind her and at the point of a gun stops them, and sends the two outlaws about their business. With Bill, however, he has a bone to pick, and bidding him take off his coat he administers a severe drubbing, that he will remember for many a day, and that will prevent him for a long time from meddling with either John or Sadie.

"AROUND PEKIN."—A most interesting scenic picture displaying among other views camel caravans, the Great Wall of China, and the funeral of a mandarin.

"JINKS WANTS TO BE AN ACROBAT."—An evening at a vaudeville show makes Sammy ambitious to become an acrobat. He chooses the street as being the most convenient place to commence in, and every possible means of practising is utilized by him, often with the most disastrous results. The wares displayed outside a china store are smashed, a pile of cans are brought to the ground, and innumerable other accidents of a similar nature occur. Ultimately, whilst balancing above an empty tub, Sammy falls inside and rolls down a flight of steps. He picks himself up unhurt, however, and a few minutes later is balancing himself on his head on the bonnet of a standing motor car. Unfortunately the automobile starts off, and Sammy, with his legs kicking in the air, is borne wildly through the streets. People are knocked over, and a general panic ensues, until the car, dashing into a store, comes to a standstill.

"HIS LIFE FOR HIS QUEEN."—It is 1780, and Marie Antoinette in her rooms at the palace of Versailles, declares her intention of going to the masked ball at the Opera that night incognito. Accompanied by her maid she attends, and, not being recognized in her mask, is approached by the chief of police, who attempts to kiss her. Without thinking of the consequences, she raises her hand and strikes him. He orders their arrest and they are conveyed to headquarters, where they are received by a young officer, who insists that they unmask. He recognizes the Queen and at once allows her to leave, but before she does so he gives her a note in which he confesses to a love for her, which he has matured in secret. Safe once more in the palace, the Queens opens the note, and after smiling rather sadly at its contents, tears it up. The next scene shows the Queen in 1793 in her prison. The Revolution has swept through France, and her execution has been decreed. In her bread she finds a note that on the morrow on the way to the scaffold an attempt will be made to rescue her. The next morning, as she is about to ascend the cart that takes the convicted to the place of execution, a disturbance suddenly occurs, and the Queen recognizes the leader as the young officer who had freed her years ago. He is, however, quickly disarmed and strangled at her feet by the National Guard. For a second Marie Antoinette stoops over the inanimate form, and the next instant she is roughly pushed up the steps of the wagon and led off to her doom.

"MYSTERY OF LONELY GULCH."—In the bar-room of Lonely Gulch an actor is entertaining the cowboys by showing them various impersonations, when the mail arrives, and he receives a letter from his sweetheart to the effect that she has got hold of an easy mark, a ranchman from Lonely Gulch. The bartender also receives a letter from the ranchman asking him to tell the boys that he is returning the following day with a bride who is an actress. The next morning the ranchman and his bride arrive on the coach and are given a great welcome. On the solicitation of his bride he offers the actor employment on his ranch, and he accompanies them there. A week later the ranchman, with the cowboys, of whom the actor is one, start off for town, but the actor, pretending his horse has gone lame, returns to the ranch, and getting back there, makes love to his sweetheart. The ranchman, who is suspicious, also turns and quietly follows and re-enters the ranch. We next see the ranchman and his bride come out carrying a body and taking it and hiding it in a eave. He then goes to the bar-room and announces that he intends to sell his ranch and go East. He

AULD ROBIN GREY

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18th

Adapted from the Scotch Poem, "Auld Robin Grey." A Pictured Love Story, Beautifully and Simply Portrayed. Length, 991 Feet.

YOUNG JAMIE loved a lassie and she loved him. His love was strong but his purse was weak, and so he went to sea to make his fortune with which to claim the lassie as his bride. The good ship "Ben Lomond" bore him away, and while he was on the seas the lassie's father had his arm broken, when the gypsies stole their cow and the mother of the lassie was taken sick.

They were poor folk and the lassie was obliged to spin and weave, keep the house, care for her father and nurse her mother. "Auld Robin Grey," a friend of the family, generous and true, aids them in the time of their need and kindly bestows his beneficence whenever he can do so without pretension or obtrusion. He likes the father and mother but he loves the daughter.

He asks her to marry him. Her parents favor good old Robin Grey, but the daughter still loves Jamie, and she cannot give heart and hand to another.

Men must work and women must weep, but it seems the poor lassie must do both, for it is not long before there is great sorrow and excitement among the town folk. The ship "Ben Lomond" is announced as wrecked, with Jamie and all on board lost. They try to keep the news from Jenny, but bad news travels quickly, and despite Robin Grey's efforts to have the shock come to her as gently as possible she sees the bulletin posted on the outside of the ship chandler's and is supported from falling by her faithful friend Robin.

Giving up her Jamie as gone to a watery grave, she is urged to marry Robin Grey, while her heart is at the bottom of the sea. Robin proves a good husband and she tries to be a good wife to him, although she does not love him.

Like one from the dead Jamie escapes the wreck and comes back to claim Jennie's hand and heart. She can scarcely believe she sees aright, and she is not easily convinced that her Jamie is alive and talking to her, and when she does realize it she tells him she is the wife of "Auld Robin Grey," and he is a good man and she will do her best to be a faithful wife to him. Jamie and she kiss and then part from each other, to go their own ways as their consciences direct.

DAVY JONES' DOMESTIC TROUBLES

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 21

A Comedy Taken from the Life of Our Old Friend, "Davy Jones," the Celebrated Fun-maker. In this Picture He Ploughs the Seas, Runs the Sand and Gathers the Wind in a Net When He Places His Heart in a Woman.

Married to a "virago," Davy wishes himself at the bottom of the sea with his namesake McGinty. His wife possesses a comely personality, but, by the great horn spoon, she has a temper like a whirlwind that spouts up and swamps the whole matrimonial ship at the slightest provocation, and poor Davy doesn't have a leg to stand on.

Captain Bragg, an old friend of Davy's, calls to see him and finds Annie (Mrs. Jones) very attractive, and remarks that "she has a dem fine figger-head for any man's craft." Davy replies that's what he said, but he finds her to be an "unmanageable tub that no man can pilot."

The high seas seem to be calling Davy, and he decides to have calm even if he has to encounter the rough and stormy life of the ancient mariner. He takes French leave and skips his domestic troubles and starts on a long voyage across the ocean blue.

After an absence of ten years Davy is mourned as dead by his wife. Old Captain Bragg comes cruising around until he takes Mrs. Jones in tow and splices up with her, accordingly she becomes Mrs. Bragg. Poor Bragg! He gets all that is coming to him, and he wishes he could join Davy and the mermaids. He is seriously contemplating "flying the coop" when Davy, who has turned up safe and sound unexpectedly, secures a job as a painter to paint the very house in which Bragg and his wife are living.

Davy runs afoul of Bragg, and only averts a collision with Mrs. Bragg through the assistance of the "slavey." After they have swapped experiences as mates of the hoodoo Annie, meaning Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Bragg, they lay ropes to cut loose from their spouse and put the expansive sea between them as soon as possible.

The ladder! Just the thing to help them out of their dilemma. Down they slide, followed by the half-witted and caricature of a "slavey," who insists upon going with them. They jolly her along a bit, give her the slip and make a dash for the first ship out of port.

In the cabin, under the protection of the Captain, an old friend, they are now started on the bounding billow, headed for a foreign shore, talking over their marital relations with Annie. They drink to their deliverance and a happy and safe voyage of the good ship which bears them away.

CLOTHES MAKES THE MAN

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22

This Comedy Cannot Be Classed Among the Generality of Comedies; it Is Philosophical as Well as Funny. While You Laugh You Think. There's a Heap in It Worth Thinking About.

"Clothes make the man, and you can't expect to make a good impression unless you keep up your personal appearance." This is the remark of one of the young fellows at one of our fashionable clubs as he is talking to another member. "You can judge a man by his coat, and appearances win every time."

"I wish to take exception," said the one addressed. "I believe a man's personality will assert itself every time, and people will take you at your real worth and recognize a man's a man for a' that."

"I am willing to wager a thousand dollars to one that I am right," said the "pessimist," "and stand ready to make good my assertion."

"I'll wager a thousand even that you are wrong," said the "optimist." "I am ready to be shown."

The agreement is signed and sealed, the "pessimist" immediately makes ready to prove "clothes versus the man," and the next day he starts out disguised as a tramp.

On his way he meets some of his old friends and acquaintances, who cut him dead, and even the dog with whom he has always been friendly will not recognize him. He goes into a restaurant, asks credit for a meal and gets "fired." He tries to make a "touch" from a friend—"Nothing doing." He goes to sleep on a bench in the park, is roughly awakened by a policeman and told to "move on."

He is thoroughly disgusted and his optimistic friend is thoroughly satisfied he has lost and his opinion contradicted by facts. The "pessimist" must now prove that the clothes make the man.

He outfits himself in a swell suit of new clothes and goes over the same scenes, meets the same friends and people, but is treated with the greatest respect and courtesy; the best is none too good for him, and he thus establishes his assertion that clothes make the man.

Back to the club once more, the pessimist wins, collects his thousand from his friend, while they make merry over the experiences of the winner and the loss of the loser.

soon arranges a deal with a neighbor and they go to the ranch to close it. The sheriff, who was in the bar-room, is, however, suspicious, and, together with two deputies, follow at a discreet distance. On their road they hear a voice calling for help and finally locate it in the cave. Here they discover the body, still living. Meantime the ranchman and the purchaser have come to a final understanding as to the sale of the ranch, and the papers are just being signed by the ranchman and his bride, when the sheriff and his deputies enter with the real ranchman, and at the point of their guns tear off the disguise from the false ranchman and disclose the familiar face of the actor, who is arrested and taken away. The bride begs forgiveness, but is ordered to make herself scarce.

EDISON MFG. CO.

"THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES."—Among the great dramatic stories of American writers, there are but few that possess the fascination and interest of Hawthorne's "The House of the Seven Gables." It has outlived its first blush of popularity and has thrilled the imagination and interest of more than one succeeding generation of readers. The peculiar dramatic value of the story lies not so much in what happens as in the feelings which prompt the happenings, and it is a task of no mean proportions to transfer this subtle fascination from the printed page to the screen story in a silent drama. The Edison Company feels that they have accomplished this task more than successfully, and take some pride in presenting this film among the really beautiful reproductions of standard works of the day. The train of events and action of the story take place in succeeding generations more than two hundred years apart. And yet by skilful dramatization we feel that we are dealing, not so much with personalities as with representatives of two houses or classes of men, and with the effect which actions of the earlier representatives have upon their children and grandchildren's fortunes in the later day.

There is a carpenter by the name of Maule who owns a pretty cottage in the historic town of Salem. A great man of the village, Colonel Pyncheon by name, fancies this place as a site for a great house for his own family. He makes an offer of purchase which Maule refuses; he then insists upon buying whether the poor man will or no. When he meets with a stubborn refusal, his wits set to work, and the days of witchcraft being at their height, he sees a way of accomplishing his purpose. Maule is accused of witchcraft, and is arrested in his own home and dragged away from his wife, daughter and son. Then a startling scene is shown where the carpenter is being led to the stake to be burned. The fires are lighted and we see the unfortunate man pronounce a curse upon Colonel Pyncheon and upon his house and children and children's children to come.

The next scene shows Maule's son, a young man, engaged upon some finishing touches in the work of the great house, which Colonel Pyncheon has built upon the site of Father's Maule's dismantled cottage. Being left alone in the great room, the son notices a grant from the king to a vast territory in the East, a grant which means the fortunes and affluence of the whole Pyncheon family. He secretes this document in a niche in the wall in the very room where it is found and behind the great picture of Colonel Pyncheon's father. When the great man returned and misses the document he flies into a passion and would pursue the young man, but that he finds himself confronted by a vision of the older Maule at the stake, his upraised hands in the curse upon him. The sight is so terrible that the old man falls back in his chair dead, and is found there by the villagers when they come to see the great house for the first time. Then the scene shifts to the later fortunes of the family, two hundred years later. The representatives who occupy the house is an old maiden woman whose circumstances are so reduced by the lack of this wonderful grant from the king, that she opens a little shop in the lower part of the house. She is not a very successful store-keeper and takes a lodger, a young man who bears a great resemblance to the Maule family of preceding generations, and she watches her unsuccessful business efforts until a young niece of her's and embodiment of youth and buoyancy, comes to help her with the shop. Trade immediately picks up because of the young girl's fascinations, and the fortunes of the family mend a little and the lodger becomes interested in the Pyncheon family from an entirely new point of view. One day, while he and the young girl are away for the day, Judge Pyncheon, a miserly relative, comes to the house and insists upon the family's right to have it razed to the ground; and a thorough search made for the missing grant from the king. He almost, in his search, stumbles upon the button which would open the space behind the portraits, but just as his finger rests upon it, again the ghostly figure of Maule at the stake appears above him and warns him away. The shock is too great for the old man, and, like his ancestor, he drops into the same antique chair and breathes his last, while the grandfather clock ticks on its way, regardless of the fact that a tragedy has taken place before its face. When the young people return to the house, they find the man dead and that the aunt has evidently been frightened by the happening and stolen away. She returns, however, in time to hear the young man announce his love and his right to speak of it even in the presence of death. He tells the whole secret of the story of the house of Seven Gables, that the curse that was pronounced upon them is operative, until the mightier force of love overrules it. His love for the young girl and hers for him can remove the curse, and as evidence that it is gone, he steps to the old portrait, pushes the button, and as it swings out he shows them the long-lost grant from the king, and, raising it, places the fortune in the hands of the girl.

"A WEDDING TRIP FROM MONTREAL THROUGH CANADA TO HONG KONG."—A honeymoon is a honeymoon, but then again there are honeymoons that are not honeymoons, and others that are but the beginning of a trip that leads to divorce courts, and others that lead to no one knows where, and very often the bride and groom finds that the honey has become sour before the rice is all combed out of their hair. Now, if we poor human beings were not built with a mass of contradictions and weaknesses pushed inside of the hoops that hold us together we all would have only one honeymoon, like one birth and one death, but the Creator fixed it so that we could not change the last two of these important events should we not fancy them, and for all we know he might have means that honeymoon affairs were to be singular instead of plural as they are so often nowadays. At any rate a honeymoon ought to be an event long to be remembered, and I am sure that the sweet bride and the big room of the Edison picture will never forget their honeymoon from Montreal, Canada, to Hong Kong, China, for many were the mishaps which befell them which proved a great amusement and joy to all but "dearie" and "lovey," who all the time persisted in taking his little wifey's picture at the most inopportune moment until he missed his train and fond hearts were miles and miles apart. But thanks to the handcar and a good fat tip they were again reunited. Had the bridegroom been a better swimmer, instead of his little wife at the Banff Hotel, Hot Sulphur Swimming Pool, he never would have spoiled his clothes, and so we have a chance to follow them all the way on their bridal tour, even on to the great Pacific steamship, "The Empress of India," where "ducky dear" discovered that air funnels were meant for other uses than to give him a quick entrance to the coal bunkers at the bottom of the ship, where he was rudely hoisted loveward into his waiting bride's arms, a mass of dirt, soot and coal dust, but if a bad beginning predicts a good ending we feel that we may wave "lovey" and "Dovey" bon voyage as the great ship sails away and their lives should be one long dream of blisses and kisses.

This picture is filled with bright comedy and abounds in novel stage settings and situations which are sure to please the motion picture audience and give them an opportunity to enjoy a trip from Montreal to Vancouver at a very small rate, namely the price of admission to any Motion Picture Theatre in the land.

KALEM CO.

"THE TYRANNY OF THE DARK."—This is the very suggestive title of a new picture drama announced by the Kalem Company. In the opening scene we are introduced to a chemist's laboratory. Here we find the old chemist busy with his test tubes and crucibles and his elder daughter Jeanne acting as his assistant. Jeanne's sweetheart is aslo connected with the laboratory, but happens to be away when the accident occurs. The retort filled with virulent acid explodes and the old chemist is killed and Jeanne is blinded.

In a distant city a younger sister is attending school. She has never met Jeaenne's fiancee, and her acquaintance dates from the moment he meets her at the station when she returns home heavy-hearted from the news of the dreadful accident. In the succeeding days in the sick room the younger sister and the young man are thrown frequently together, and by one of the strange circumstances which happen so often in real life, their fondness for each other grows into love in spite of the fact that they both are loyal to the blind sister and fight against their growing affection; but love will have its way and the truth soon comes out. It so happens that the blind girl learns of it almost as soon as does her sister and the young man, and a most dramatic ending is furnished to the story in the climatic scene in which the blind girl renounces the young man and gives him to her young sister.

In telling this story the Kalem players have done excellently well and the cast contains the pick of the Kalem Stock Company.

"THE EDUCATION OF ELIZABETH."—Lovers of breezy Western comedy will take great delight in "The Education of Elizabeth," which the Kalem Company announce for Friday, Oct. 21. The story centers around a young daughter of a Western ranchman, who is sent to a swell Eastern school to be "finished." Elizabeth's education is not as complete as could be expected and she blossoms into a most beautiful and swaggering young girl. None of her experiences in the East, however, have dulled her love for the West and for Western men, and her heart still beats fondly for a tall young cowboy who is the foreman of her father's ranch.

A designing aunt in the East, however, has an idea that a match can be arranged with her son, a typical Broadway swell, and so after Elizabeth has returned from school to the ranch a gay young blade from Broadway comes out West to capture Elizabeth and her fortune in one fell swoop. Elizabeth does not, however, see things in the same light, and with the cowboy sweetheart and her pals she plans such a warm reception for the young man that he is only too glad to make tracks for the East and leave Elizabeth to her cowboy sweetheart.

The humor of the story is rich and it will be enjoyed by Easterners and Westerners alike.

In "The Education of Elizabeth" the Kalem Company introduces a new and attractive member of their stock company, Miss Alice Joyce, whose early work is so promising and whose personality is so winsome that she is likely to become well known to the moving picture public in coming Kalem issues.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"THE BROKEN DOLL."—This Biograph story shows to what extreme gratitude may lead a mere child, and one who is looked upon as semi-civilized at that. The subject clearly depicts that a kindly action will never go unrewarded. Joe Stevens came out West to court fortune prospecting in the mountains. He has met with more than fair success and writes his wife that she might join him as soon as she could. Wishing to surprise him, she and their child appear before him unannounced. On the day of her arrival a party of Indians from a reservation nearby visit the village to procure supplies. Among them is a little Indian girl, who, being an unfavored child, is very roughly treated by her mother. The poor tot has never known a kind word or attention. Approaching the cabin of Stevens, the little Indian beholds Joe's child playing with a very pretty doll. The doll fascinates the Indian girl and Mrs. Stevens persuades her daughter to give it to her. This act of kindness, the first the poor little child has ever experienced, so overwhelms her with gratitude that she is at a loss to know how to express it. However, her little heart pulsates with a new energy, and she leaves her new found friends all aglow with thanks. Meanwhile, the Indians have been making a round of the stores and one of them is cruelly assassinated by a drunken rowdy. The Indians, vowing vengeance, return to the reservation with the lifeless brave. A council of war is held, during which the little one appears with the doll in her arms. One of the Indians seizes this effigy of a white baby and hurls it over the bank, and when the girl climbs down and regains it she finds it hopelessly broken. Heart-crushed, the little one buries it in true Indian fashion, and as she is prostrate before the tiny pyre she hears the noise of the war dance. Hastening to the scene she realizes the the grave danger of her first and only friends, and runs off to warn them. She isn't any too soon for the infuriated Indians are starting out. Joe dashes through the village arousing the inhabitants, and although the redskins have devastated and burned outlying property, they meet with powerful resistance at the village proper and are driven off. Everyone is loud in their praise for the little Indian child and are anxious to know her whereabouts. Alas, they will never know, for the little one, wounded during the conflict, has just strength enough to reach the little grave where she falls, making it a double one, and her pure soul parts with the little body sacrificed upon the altar of gratitude.

"THE BANKER'S DAUGHTERS."—The crook is ever possessed of an element of subtlety and inventive ingenuity, which, if exercised in worthy efforts, would be highly commendable. Fate, however, always ethical, is unceasingly conspiring against a successful consummation of his sinister effects. The apparent wealth in the suburban home of Mr. C. W. Bourne, the banker, has excited the cupidity of three members of the under-world. They therefore concoct a scheme to gain an entrance. First of all, they would learn the layout of the house. This they do by disguising one of their number as a messenger and delivering a fake package at the house. He reports to his comrades, and entering a large trunk, the other two dress as expressmen to deliver it with human contents. But there is another thing to be effected; that is to get the banker, who is the widowered father of two daughters, out of the way. This they do by sending the following telegram: "Come to New York at once. Big shortage. Cashier has committed suicide. Coulter." At the time of the arrival of this telegram, the banker is presenting his youngest daughter who has been ill, with a beautiful diamond necklace. This little surprise he effects to lift the girl's spirits. Of course, he is loath to leave, particularly as the men servants are off for the evening. Still, the message is urgent and seems plausible so he goes. Shortly after his departure, the trunk is delivered, and though there is some question, his oldest daughter receives it into the reception room, thinking it another of her father's surprises, she not knowing what had called him away so suddenly. The invalid sister is resting in the room next the reception room, while the sister is in the reception room admiring her sister's present before the mirror. Suddenly she sees the reflection of a hand protruding from the trunk, which is now slightly open. The man inside hears her move, and the hand is drawn back. She pretends not to notice the occurrence, while hurriedly writing a note to Martha, the maid, dispatching her little niece, who happens to be in the room at this moment. This note reads: "There is a robber in the room. Telephone for police and keep quiet." As the child passes through the adjoining room, the invalid sister insists upon seeing the note, and after a parlay gets it. Rushing to the telephone, she calls the police headquarters. The desk man is dozing, and it is with difficulty she makes his answer and understand. When he does, he acts quickly, sending four officers on a mad rush to the Bourne mansion. Meanwhile, a thrilling scene is being enacted in the reception room. The man having gotten out of the trunk, renders the girl helpless, admits his accomplices and the three are ransacking the place when the police enter and capture them. At this moment the father returns, having found the message a trick, so the little family is thankful that nothing more serious has happened than the shaking up of their nerves.

"GRANDMOTHER'S PLOT."—The grand daughter of a farmer is in love with one of the farm hands, a fine, manly-looking fellow, but the farmer sits on the little affair with great suddenness. Her grandmother, however, remembers that she herself was young once, and focusses her brain on the subject. The plot is hatched, and the maiden is to become ill, and the doctor is to be sent for; then, when he arrives, grandmother will let him into the deep business, and he prescribes accordingly. All happens as was planned. The old farmer sends for the doctor; the grandmother buttonholes him as he arrives, and tells him the tale. Consequently, the farmer is a beaten man, as with all three against him he has to give in, and does it with a very good grace. The film is of fine photographic quality, and interest is sustained throughout.

"THE CHEAT."—A strong film, but not too dramatic. A young woman has a great affection for a man residing in the same hotel. Her affection is much misplaced, however, for the feeling is not returned. Thinking he has been playing with her, she determines to revenge herself, and finds for this a ready helper in a man also staying at the hotel. He places in the young fellow's pocket some playing cards, and that same evening at the Casino, when these two are playing cards with a party, the young fellow is accused by the man of cheating, and the cards being found on his person, he is shown out. From that date his life is a misery, but his uncle, certain of his innocence, offers a reward for information, as to who placed the cards in his nephew's pocket. The real culprit, being in want of cash, comes forward, gets the money, and confesses his guilt, and is compelled by the angry old man to accompany him to the Casino, and publicly announce the fact,

"PHANTOM RIDE FROM AIX-LES-BAINS."—Phantom Ride from Aix-les-Bains to Mount Revard. A pretty scenic film, with some magnificent stereoscopic views of snow-clad hills. Throughout the film is excellent, and its beauties will cause all to wish for more.

In this film we pass through some of the loveliest spots of the Savoy. In the distance we can see Aix-les-Bains and the Lake du Bourget, which are well-known to all tourists.

"IN THE SHADOW OF THE NIGHT."—A family of wandering basketmakers are camped upon the edge of the city in which they market their wares. At the time our story opens the mother had just returned empty-handed, from a day of peddling. A series of such days has already depleted their meagre stores to such an extent that her report comes in the shape of a calamity.

Now their little son volunteers to make an attempt to secure at least food in return for some of their basket work, and takes some of the lighter pieces with him to a wealthy neighborhood in the city.

Here his apparent poverty wins for him the friendship of a rich youth who helps him by supplying food, then follows at a distance and learns the straightened circumstances with which the little fellow is surrounded. The little child of wealth now returns to his home and under cover of darkness steals a well-filled purse from his father and carries it to the camp of the basketmakers, where he places it on the pillow of the little man who unconsciously is the instigator of the crime.

The morning soon reveals the robbery at the rich boy's home, and investigation is immediately commenced, detectives are called in and soon establish a line of clews which point to the guilt of the little basketmaker. Members of the poor family are all arrested and brought to the scene of the crime, where, though violently declaring their innocence, they are retained.

At this juncture, the real criminal is so touched by the grief of his little friend that he bravely confesses his guilt and begs the forgiveness of his father.

The final scene shows the happy elleviation of the poor family's sufferings.

The film is a very strong lesson upon the subject of kindness and contains enough of the exciting element to hold the attention of an audience.

"TUNNY FISHING OFF PALERMO, ITALY."—The tunny is a deep sea fish, but periodically approaches the shore, wandering in large shoals, at least in the Mediterranean, within well-known areas along the coast. The regularity of its appearance on certain parts of the coasts of the Mediterranean has led to the establishment of a systematic fishery, which has been carried on from the time of the Phoenicians to the present day. Immense numbers of tunnies were caught on the Spanish coast and in the Sea of Marmora, where, however, this industry has much declined. The Sardinian tunnies were considered to be of superior excellence. The greatest number is now caught on the north coast of Sicily, the fisheries of this island supplying most of the preserved tunny which is exported to other parts of the world.

"AULD ROBIN GREY."—Young Jamie loved a lassie and she loved him. His love was strong but his purse was weak, and so he went to sea to make his fortune with which to claim the lassie as his bride. The good ship "Ben Lomond" bore him away, and while he was on the seas the lassie's father has his arm broken, when the gypsies stole their cow and the mother of the lassie was taken sick.

They were poor folk and the lassie was obliged to spin and weave, keep the house, care for her father and nurse her mother. "Auld Robin Grey," a friend of the family, generous and true, aids them in the time of their need and kindly bestows his beneficence whenever he can do so without pretension or obtrusion. He likes the father and the mother but he loves the daughter.

He asks her to marry him. Her parents favor good old Robin Grey, but the daughter still loves Jamie, and she cannot give heart and hand to another.

Men must work and women must weep, but it seems the poor lassie must do both, for it is not long before there is great sorrow and excitement among the town folk. The ship "Ben Lomond" is announced as wrecked, with Jamie and all on board lost. They try to keep the news from Jennie, but bad news travels quickly, and despite Robin Grey's efforts to have the shock come to her as gently as possible she sees the bulletin posted on the outside of the ship chandler's and is supported from falling by her faithful friend Robin.

Giving up her Jamie as gone to a watery grave, she is urged to marry Robin Grey, while her heart is at the bottom of the sea. Robin proves a good husband and she tries to be a good wife to him, although she does not love him.

Like one from the dead Jamie escapes the wreck and comes back to claim Jennie's hand and heart. She can scarcely believe she sees aright, and she is not easily convinced that her Jamie is alive and talking to her, and when she does realize it she tells him she is the wife of "Auld Robin Grey," and he is a good man and she will do her best to be a faithful wife to him. Jamie and she kiss and then part from each other, to go their own ways as their consciences direct.

"DAVY JONES' DOMESTIC TROUBLES."—Married to a "virago," Davy wishes himself at the bottom of the sea with his namesake McGinty. His wife possesses a comely personality, but, by the great horn spoon, she has a temper like a whirlwind that spouts up and swamps the whole matrimonial ship at the slightest provocation, and poor Davy doesn't have a leg to stand on.

Captain Bragg, an old friend of Davy's, calls to see him and finds Annie (Mrs. Jones) very attractive, and remarks that "she has a dem fine figger-head for any man's craft." Davy replies that's what he said, but he finds her to be an "unmanageable tub that no man can pilot."

The high seas seem to be calling Davy, and he decides to have calm even if he has to encounter the rough and stormy life of the ancient mariner. He takes French leave and skips his domestic troubles and starts on a long voyage across the ocean blue.

After an absence of ten years Davy is mourned as dead by his wife, and old Captain Bragg comes cruising around until he takes the widowed Mrs. Jones in tow and splices up with her, and accordingly she becomes Mrs. Bragg. Poor Bragg! He gets all that is coming to him, and he wishes he could join Davy and the mermaids. He is seriously contemplating "flying the coop" when Davy, who has turned up safe and sound unexpectedly, secures a job as a painter to paint the very house in which Bragg and his wife are living.

Davy runs afoul of Bragg, and only averts a collision with Mrs. Bragg through the assistance of the "slavey." After they have swapped experiences as mates of the hoodoo Annie, meaning Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Bragg, they lay ropes to cut loose from their spouse and put the expansive sea between them as soon as possible.

The ladder! Just the thing to help them out of their dilemma. Down they slide, followed by the half-witted and caricature of a "slavey," who insists upon going with them. They jolly her along a bit, give her the slip and make a dash for the first ship out of port.

In the cabin, under the protection of the captain, an old friend, they are now started on the bounding billow, headed for a foreign shore, talking over their marital relations with Annie; they drink to their deliverance and a happy and safe voyage of the good ship which bears them away.

THE BROKEN DOLL

A Tragedy of the Indian Reservation

This is probably one of the most picturesque and thrilling Indian stories ever produced in pictures. It shows the extreme gratitude of an Indian child for the first act of kindness ever bestowed upon her. A little white child presents the Indian girl with a pretty doll, and later when there is an Indian outbreak this tot at the sacrifice of her life warns her new found friends in time for them to move to safety. The war dance and the devastation of a portion of the village by the Indians are most realistic, while the photography and scenic beauty have never been excelled.

unless you keep up your personal appearance." This is the remark of one of the young fellows at one of our fashionable clubs as he is talking to another member. "You can judge a man by his coat, and appearances win every time."

"I wish to take exception," said the one addressed. "I believe a man's personality will assert itself every time, and people will take you at your real worth and recognize a man's a man for a' that."

"I am willing to wager a thousand dollars to one that I am right," said the pessimistic gentleman, "and stand ready to make good my assertion."

"I'll wager a thousand even that you are wrong," said the optimist. "I am ready to be shown."

The agreement is signed and sealed, and the pessimist immediately makes ready to prove "clothes versus the man," and the next day he starts out disguised as a tramp.

On his way he meets some of his old friends and acquaintances, who cut him dead, and even the dog with whom he has always been friendly will not recognize him. He goes into a restaurant, asks credit for a meal and gets "fired." He tries to make a "touch" from a friend—"nothing doing." He goes to sleep on a bench in the park, is roughly awakened by a policeman and told to "move on."

He is thoroughly disgusted and his optimistic friend is thoroughly satisfied he has lost and his opinion contradicted by facts. The test is not finished; he must now prove that the clothes make the man.

He outfits himself in a swell suit of new clothes and goes over the same scenes, meets the same friends and people, but is treated with the greatest respect and courtesy; the best is none too good for him, and he thus establishes his assertion that clothes make the man.

Back to the club once more, the pessimist wins, collects his thousand from his friend, while they make merry over the experiences of the winner and the loss of the loser.

"THE FOREMAN."—The horse market day is well known on the Western ranch and ofttimes attracts buyers from many parts of the country. John Twist had secured a new foreman and entrusts him with the payroll for the ranch riders on the lower ranch. Placing the sack containing the money in his saddle bags; rides hurriedly to execute his mission, and upon arriving is astonished to find the saddle bags had been lost and rushes madly back to find them. But no trace is found of the money.

In the meantime Arizona and Red, two well-known characters thereabout, had discovered the missing payroll and made way to a secret hiding place. The new foreman, being a man of high moral principle, reports at once to his employer, but his explanations are not accepted. On the contrary, he is suspected of theft and held a prisoner in the ranch house for the arrival of the sheriff.

Having his suspicions of the guilty parties, he conceives a plan to track them to their hiding place and clear his own name, even at great risk of his life—catching his guard unawares, he overpowers him, takes his gun and escapes in the woods.

The neighborhood is thoroughly aroused and a posse is quickly on his trail, being aided by Arizona and Red, the real culprits. Blanche, the ranchman's daughter, whose favorite pastime was sketching and painting, had repaired to a shaded nook in the lower meadow in the hopes of realizinig the anticipated sunset glow for a canvas she was just finishing, when the foreman, tattered and torn from the underbrush and weak for want of food, chanced to come upon her. His entreatings and pleading for food and protection gained her sympathy and her lunch basket was given him.

The approach of her brother so hastens his departure that his gun, the one taken from the guard was left behind, and found by the brother, who brought his sister to task, but was finally persuaded to pledge his protection for the foreman. Blanche's wits are tested and a quick decision brings the hunted man back to her at the easel and a wound quickly painted on his bare back, after which his prostrate form was laid face down, apparently lifeless to Arizona and Red who were now fast approaching. Being informed by the brother that he himself had shot him, the news quickly spreads and the sheriff and posse follow the man back to the spot, but find it was only a scheme to elude arrest, as all were gone and left no trace. The foreman, following Red and Arizona under cover, discovers the hiding place of the money and makes the way back to the ranch to summon proof. They arrive in time to intercept the real culprits as they are laying out the money. The foreman is exonerated and the sheriff leaves with his new prisoners.

"TWO BOYS IN BLUE."—

A Wild West show—they stranded went.
Says Hank to Bill—"The army for us."
Togged all up in blue—with nary a cent,
Spoiling for an Indian fight—or Wild West fuss.

The lure of the white-top and the music of the band is food for the bronco buster and he is happy with plaudits of the gathered throng. The grand entre is on and all is agog with excitement as Tom and Jerry cut their capers. Just then Sheriff Ketchem rudely announces he has an attachment for an unpaid feed bill at Hebron, Ind., and proceeds to "sew" the show up. So Bronco Bill's congress of celebrities are busted—broke and hard on the rocks.

Tom and Jerry retire gracefully with their tools in trade—two saddles. But as the cook tent was one of the things Sheriff Ketchem had planted on, there was no sign of the forthcoming bean soup, coffee and—as well as other delicacies usually accompany the cook tops repast. So the poor man's friend—the pawnshop—holds out its welcoming hand to Tom and Jerrey's saddles. The loan made, the boys are out to see the sights. But they cost money, and soon the two are on the breakers again, when they are attracted to Uncle Sam's sign calling for recruits.

This seems to hold the key to the best excitement outside the rag and blue inclosure, and accordingly they are assigned to detachment that is detailed to put down an Indian uprising. The officer in charge soon finds he has found two real knights of the saddle, and decides to send them scouting to locate the hostile tribe; they are soon surprised and find more real excitement than Bronco Bill ever dreamed of. The old water hole is destined to figure in operation; a message is received by the commander of the post that the men are surrounded and can only hold out six hours longer signed by Capt. John Wells. Upon receipt of the message the scouts are sent to lead the cavalry against the Indians' stronghold; desperate fighting and final victory, one that has resounded through the pages of history and has made the army post memorable and even to-day Standing Rock has become a landmark of the great northwest reservations. When Tom and Jerry are decorated with honors they plainly show that this world isn't so bad after all.

"HANK AND LANK."—Hank and Lank have not experienced a good feed for several days, and, on the lookout for a meal or a handout, pass by the Summerford residence, just as Mr. and Mrs. Summerford, carrying suit cases and hand bags, hurriedly lock the front door and leave. A sign, informing callers of their absence during the summer, is conspicuously placed in the window.

After the couple have departed, Hank and Lank, who have been covertly watching them, come on the scene, scrutinize the sign, and with the happy thought that possibly the absent occupants may have left good food in the larder, try the front door, but find it locked.

Not without hope they slip around the house and after trying several windows find one unlocked. Lank raises the sash and after helping Hank through, follows closely after.

The window has admitted them to the kitchen and they lose no time in exploring about the larder and the ice box. Their search is successful, as Hank has found a large, juicy steak, while Lank has returned from the dining room with liquor and cigars.

Hank starts a fire in the stove, and after filling the room with smoke succeeds in turning out something fairly palatable. The two, though somewhat annoyed by the smoke, sit down to an enjoyable meal.

The scene changes to the outside of the Summerford home, showing the open window and volumes of smoke pouring from it. A passerby sees the smoke and thinking the house on fire rushes to a firebox and turns in an alarm.

The engines hurry to the scene and a stream of water is turned into the open window. Hank and Lank, inside, swept from their feet by the sudden torrent, seek refuge under the tables and chairs until the firemen turn off the water and leave. Then, gathering up the remains of their repast, they leave the house.

"HIRING A GEM."—Dick Younghusband is in an unusually bad frame of mind, when, late for breakfast, he finds the victuals cold, the toast hard and the coffee merely lukewarm. Angrily he calls Molly, the cook, scolds her roundly and banging the coffee pot on the table threatens to discharge her if she does not hereafter provide him with a warm breakfast. The fiery little lady listens with rising temper, and when he is finally forced to desist in his upbraiding for lack of breath, throws off her apron, shakes her fist at him, and tells him where she can get another position.

Molly leaves and Mrs. Younghusband angrily scolds her husband for his impatience, and further adds that if Dick does not get her another cook he'll have no dinner. Younghusband laughs scornfully. A cook, indeed! He promises his wife to bring home a servant with him that evening without fail and hurriedly leaves for the office.

After an unusually busy day at the office, Younghusband recalls he has had no time to find a cook. It is after five o'clock and when he calls up several employment agencies the 'phone calls are not answered. In despair he is about to leave the office when Henry Little, a friend, enters. Younghusband informs his friend of his predicament and suddenly asks Little to make up as a female cook and thus help him to save the day.

After some argument Little resolves to play the part, and after visiting a costumer, where the young man is rigged out to resemble a real Irish cook, the two hurry to Younghusband's home.

The new cook is introduced to Mrs. Younghusband, who shows "Maggie" to the kitchen and gives him instructions about the supper. "Maggie" has some difficulty in preparing the meal, but the catastrophe comes in the dining room when he tries to wait on the table. In his awkwardness "Maggie" almost demolishes all the tableware, but Younghusband is lenient and begs his wife to give the poor woman a chance.

Dick goes out to the kitchen to remonstrate with Little for his awkwardness, but this latter has found two bottles of beer in the refrigerator and invites Dick to join him. Dick produces the cigars and a moment later when Mrs. Younghusband enters she finds her husband and "Maggie," this latter with his feet cocked up on the table, smoking and drinking and laughing over the fun.

In a rage Mrs. Younghusband drags her unlucky spouse from the room and "Maggie," left alone, soon finds company in the neighboring policeman, Pat O'Rourke. But "Maggie's" dress catches on fire from the cigar he had been smoking and not even the bucket of water O'Rourke douses him with puts out the flames. Mrs. Younghusband and Dick enter to see "Maggie" running out of the door and headed for the lake.

The final scenes show "Maggie" running into the lake and being rescued by the valiant O'Rourke.

"PALS OF THE RANGE."—The scene opens in the bunk house of the Lazy K ranch, where we see Jack Hartley and his pal, Jack Smythe. Hartley has just received a letter from the East, in which his mother asks him for money. Hartley is much depressed. He is broke and sees no immediate prospect of recouping his fortunes. Smythe, learning of Hartley's dilemma, offers his roll to his pal, who gratefully accepts it.

Some time later the two boys meet Clara, the daughter of a neighboring ranchman, and both fall in love with her. For a time it seems a fair field and no favor, but at last she seems to show preference for Smythe. The two boys discuss the matter at the bunk house, and decide to write her letters of proposal and abide by her decision. They write and mail their letters, and she replies, accepting Smythe.

Hartley goes for the mail, and his weak nature asserting itself, he surreptitiously opens the letters before returning to the ranch house. His own letter is superscribed "Dear Jack," and reading it he finds that he is rejected. The other letter, accepting Symthe, is headed "To My Sweetheart," and Hartley sees the possibility of changing the letters in their respective envelopes and so making Smythe believe that he is the rejected one. He puts his plan into operation, and Smythe, upon receiving his letter of rejection, immediately announces his intention of going prospecting into the desert. He leaves at once, never suspecting the treachery of his pal, and the girl, believing herself jilted, is easily persuaded to marry Hartley.

After the wedding the latter's conscience troubles him to such an extent that he confesses his miserable deed, and Clara, turning upon him indignation and disgust, demands that he at once go into the desert and bring Smythe back to her. Cowering before her indignation, he goes in search of his pal.

Smythe, prospecting in the burning desert, is beset by Indians, and although he ascapes with his life, they get his horse and pack mules. He makes a running fight of it, holding them back with difficulty, and, at last, exhausted and almost dead of thirst he is about to give up the unequal fight when Hartley arrives. Hartley at once rides to the defense of his pal and together they hold back the savages for a time, but Hartley is wounded. He realizes that both of them cannot escape, and urges his pal to take the horse and make his escape. Smythe at last does so, and Hartley, covering the other's retreat, is killed by the attacking Indians, but not before he knows that he has saved the life of his pal and so made restitution for his treachery.

A Money-Making Machine

The Edengraph is a poor man's proposition; it is for the man who finds it hard to make money—and others as well.

There are many tools the wealthy showman can afford to use that would drag the one under water who must carefully count his dollars.

No showman of modest means can afford wastes either of time or money; he must work without waste or his income vanishes.

We took up the Edengraph first and foremost because it gets down to the dead hard rock bed of economical operation; because it is the only projecting machine in existence that works without waste or worry.

Therefore we say the Edengraph is a poor man's proposition and is put out on substantially a profit-sharing basis. It goes into an operating room and divides the slice it cuts from the repair bill and worry bill between the purchaser and ourselves. The exhibitor thus gets his machine for nothing, and a weekly profit besides.

Even for the wealthy man, the man who can afford wastes but prefers to save the money they cost and put it legitimately into strengthening his business, the Edengraph is undeniably the best investment to be made in projecting machines. Write us.

Mr. Hallberg's able grasp of the subject and the happy facility with which he avoids technical phraseology and makes clear, in ordinary language to the ordinary layman, exactly what he wishes to impart, should commend these "Talks" to every reader of The Film Index. Every exhibitor and every operator should especially follow this course, and preserve The Film Index, in careful order, for these articles alone. The illustrations are admirable and are a great aid in making still clearer the written word.

Valuable Pointers on Picture Acting.

I have been much interested in reading a printed notice, posted in the studio of the Selig Polyscope Co., with a number of valuable suggestions for the members of the stock company. There are eighteen of these instructive suggestions and I believe they will be read with profit by every one interested in the making of moving pictures:

ACTION.—When the director gives you the word for action at the start of a scene, don't wait and look at the camera to see if it is going. That will be taken care of and started when the action settles down to where the directors think the scene should start.

LOOKING AT CAMERA.—Never look toward the director when he speaks to you during the action of a scene and while the camera is running. He may be reminding you that you are out of the picture, or of some piece of business you have forgotten. Glancing toward the camera near the finish of a scene to see if it has stopped is also a bad habit. The director will inform you when the scene is over.

EYES.—Use your eyes as much as possible in your work. Remember that they express your thoughts more clearly when properly used than gestures or unnatural facial contortions. Do not squint. You will never obtain the results you are striving for if you get into that very bad habit.

MAKING EXITS.—In making an exit through a door, or out of the picture, never slack up just on the edge; use a little more exertion and continue well out of range of the camera. Many scenes have been weakened by such carelessness.

LETTER WRITING.—In writing before the camera, do so naturally. Do not make rapid dashes over the paper. You completely destroy the realism that you are expected to convey by so doing. When reading a letter mentally count five slowly before you show by your expression the effect of the letter upon your mind.

READING LETTER.—When a lady receives a letter from her sweetheart or husband she must not show her joy by kissing it. That is overdone and has become so common by usage in pictures and on the stage as to be tiresome.

KISSING.—When kissing your sweetheart, husband or wife, do so naturally—not a peck on the lips and a quick break-a-way. Also use judgment in the length of your kiss. Vary it by the degree of friendship, or love, that you are expected to convey.

GESTURES.—Do not use unnecessary gestures. Repose in your acting is of more value. A gesture well directed can convey a great deal, while too many may detract from the realism of your work.

STRUGGLING.—Avoid unnecessary struggling and body contortions. Many scenes appear ridiculous by such action. For example, if in a scrimmage you are overpowered by superior numbers, don't kick, fight and squirm, unless you are portraying a maniac or a man maddened beyond control. Use common sense in this.

SHUTTING THE DOORS.—Be careful in opening and shutting of doors in a set, so as not to jar the scenery. Carelessness in this respect causes make-overs, with a considerable loss of time and film, both of which are valuable.

IN PICTURE.—Be sure that you stay in the picture while working. Mentally mark with your eyes the limitations of the camera's focus, and keep within bounds. You can do this with a little practice and without appearing purposely to do so.

SMOKING.—Don't smoke near the camera or where the smoke can blow across the lens. Take just as good care about kicking up a dust. If you are on a horse it is not necessary to ride circles around the camera. Throwing dust into a camera will cause scratches, and bring down upon your head the righteous wrath of the operator.

GOSSIP.—Avoid discussing the secrets of the business you are engaged in. Remember that much harm is done by spreading the news of all the happenings of the day in your work. Revealing to outsiders the plots and names of pictures you are working on or have just finished is frequently taken advantage of and causes great loss to your firm, by some rival concern rushing a picture out ahead that they have on hand, of the same nature. All gossip of an injurious nature is deplorable, and will not be indulged in by any people who appreciate their position and wish to remain in the good graces of their employer.

PROMPTNESS.—Come to work on time. An allowance of ten minutes will be granted for a difference in watches, but be sure it is ten minutes BEFORE and not ten AFTER. There are no hardships inflicted upon you, and you owe it to your employer to be as prompt in this matter as you expect him to be in the payment of your salary.

MAKE-UP.—Regarding make-up and dress, do some thinking for yourself. Remember that the director has many troubles, and his people should lighten his burden in this matter as much as possible. For example: If you are told to play as a "49" miner, figure out in your own mind how you should appear, and don't ask the director if high-laced boots will do when you should know that they have only been in use for a few years. Don't ask him if pants with side pockets will do, when you know they were never worn at that period. A poor country girl should never wear high French heels, silk stockings and long form corsets; nor should her hair be done in the latest fashion. She would look very much out of the picture in such a make-up carrying a milk pail. Do not redden the lips too much, as a dark red takes nearly black. Likewise in rouging the face, do not touch up the cheeks only and leave the nose and forehead white. The effect of such a make-up is hideous in photography.

Get in the habit of thinking out for yourself all the little details that go to complete a perfect picture of the character you are to portray. Then, if there is anything you do not understand do not be afraid to ask the director.

BEARDS.—In the making of beards one cannot be too careful. This is an art that every actor can become proficient in, if he will only take the pains to do so. Remember that the camera magnifies every defect in your make-up. Just use your mental faculties to give some thought to your character studies and you will win out.

SLEEVES.—Avoid playing too many parts with your sleeves rolled up. Cowboys and miners use the sleeves of their shirts for what they were intended. If you are playing tennis, or courting a girl at the seaside, you may display your manly beauty to your heart's content. Do not let common stage usages govern you in this matter.

PROFANITY.—Let the gentlemen exercise care when in the presence of ladies and children to use no profanity. It is just as easy to express yourself without it if you will only try it.

USE NO PROFANITY IN THE PICTURES.—There are thousands of deaf mutes who attend the theatres and who understand every movement of your lips.

PARTS.—Do not become peeved if you are not given the part you think you ought to have. The director knows what type of person he wishes to use in a particular part, and if it is not given to you it is because some other person is better fitted for it.

We should all work for the general good. By giving our employer the best we have in us, we are greatly benefiting him, and by so doing are enhancing our own value.

Independents Perniciously Active.

F. B. Mytinger, special representative of the General Film Co., 85 Dearborn street, returned last week from a three weeks' trip through Western Iowa, S. Dakota and Nebraska. Mr. Mytinger reports that conditions in licensed circles are good all through the section visited, and that exhibitors are all making money.

KING SOLOMON'S HALL.

Class "A" Photoplay Theatre, at 1745 West Filmore Street, San Francisco, Cal. Owned by the Filmore Street Amusement Co., of which Harry Baehr is President, William L. Wethered, secretary, and W. P. Filmer, vice-president.

This is the largest and best equipped theatre used exclusively for Photoplays on the Pacific Coast. The building is absolutely fireproof, and is heated throughout with steam, and is equipped with three Pathe machines—the first to use the Pathe machine in San Francisco.

The average service prevailing is from 15 to 60 days, with two to three changes weekly and two to three reels used at each change, the admission being 10 cents. Most of the theatres confine the programs to pictures and illustrated songs, a few using cheap vaudeville at an admission of 15 cents.

Mr. Mytinger was impressed by the fact that licensed exhibitors throughout this section did not realize, in due measure, the vast distinction between the licensed and the "independent" product. He saw only two copies of The Film Index on his trip; a New York publication, noted for its straddling-the-fence proclivities, being largely in evidence. He attributed the attitude of licensed exhibitors, in their apathetic view the distinction between the quality of licensed and "independent" products, to the perusal of the paper in question. Besides, the section is being flooded with tons of circular matter, sent out weekly by loud-mouthed "independent" exchanges, all of the screeds baying loudly against the so-called "Trust."

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Selig Eastern stock company was engaged in the production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," at the Selig plant, the week of October 3.

Mr. and Mrs. John B. Rock moved into their city residence last week, from their Fox Lake cottage.

Al. T. Willis, owner and manager of the Majestic theatre, Danville, Ill., visited the General Film Co.'s office, 85 Dearborn street, last week, in the interests of J. C. Barker, of New Decatur, Ala., and purchased supplies, etc., for him. Mr. Barker is about to open a new house in his home city.

The Vanderberg Bros., music dealers in Marionette, Wis., are engaged in the construction of their new theatre in that city, which will be opened Oct. 25. They have arranged for chairs, machines and supplies, etc., in this city, and have contracted for a good quality film service with the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street.

M. A. Choynski, owner and manager of the Odeon theatre, 318 S. Halsted street, has been using an original method of presenting motion pictures for some time past in order to make, as he thinks, a more striking appeal to the tastes of his patrons. Manager Choynski employs actors and actresses to talk the scenes in the various pictures, a study of the parts being made by them from the bulletin description of each film subject. Manager Choynski is well pleased with the results, from the box office standpoint.

THE ESSANAY GUIDE.

The Essanay Guide of this week's issue, dated Oct. 15, is an especially attractive edition, with a new cover of artistic design and much news of interest to the exhibitors. Announcement is made of the decision in the Essanay contest, which will prove interesting to those who have competed in the contest. The booklet also makes announcement of the coming world championship baseball series film which will be made by the Essanay Company.

Descriptions of the following films are also contained in this issue of the Guide:

"Hiring a Gem," a comedy, the theme of which is concerned with the servant girl problem. The film is abundant with unusually funny situations and should prove a genuine hit.

"Hank and Lank" (uninvited guests), released with "Hiring a Gem," Oct. 19, is another of the Essanay's popular cartoon series.

"Pals of the Range," a Western drama, is another from the new Essanay Western Stock Company. A strong feature is an Indian fight in the last scenes, which approaches realism more closely than anything of this nature ever produced. It will be released Oct. 22.

"The Boquet" is an excellent comedy, telling how a careless messenger boy unwittingly brings together an unhappy couple who are drifting apart. The story is unique and excellently acted.

UNDER THE STARS AND BARS

A Highly Meritorious War Drama Produced By the Melies Company, in Which is Told a Story of Old Vicksburg.

The Civil War was perhaps the cause of more sorrows to mothers and children of American men than any other incident in the Nation's history. During the four years of that fierce struggle between brothers of the North and South, wives were left widows and children fatherless. It is upon this theme that Melies have based their coming drama "Under the Stars and Bars."

Sitting by the fireside of his home in old Vicksburg with his wife and child close by him, a young soldier of the South is aroused from his peaceful repose by the call to arms of the Confederate army. With tearful entreaties his wife bids him remain, but his patriotism is strong in the heart of that Southern gentleman, so that he gives up all that is nearest and dearest to him to serve the cause.

SCENE FROM MELIES SUBJECT "UNDER THE STARS AND BARS."

Then come war scenes. The young husband, entrusted with an important message, to deliver which he has to pass through the enemies' lines, is captured by the latter and made a prisoner of war. He tries in every way possible to communicate with his wife, but the rules of warfare forbade.

Meanwhile the wife and child are alone in their home when the storming of Vicksburg occurs. The old homestead is wrecked by the flying missiles and both are driven homeless into the streets.

The war over, the young Confederate soldier returned to his home only to find it deserted. His only hope was to turn to the hospital, where he is cared for by those sisters of charity who so nobly gave their lives to nurse our soldiers at that time. While convalescing he was wheeled into a park at Vicksburg to enjoy a sun bath. Who happened to be there but his wife and child on one of the park benches. But a fruit peddler is to be thanked for bringing them together once again, for the little girl obtained money from her mother with which to buy some apples, and in doing so spied this wounded soldier for whom her heart took pity. She bought an extra one for him. Then, just like a child, she rushed back to her mother and insisted that she come and see the disabled soldier. A most dramatic scene takes place when husband and wife meet, for each has given the other up as dead. Of course, all are made happy, especially the child who did not remember her father, but who really found for herself a father and that one her own.

"Under the Stars and Bars" will be released October 27.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"SIMPLE DOTTY DIMPLE."—Words by Will J. Harris; music by Harry I. Robinson; published by Will Rossiter, Chicago. One of those child songs that are so dear to the hearts of women and children. The slides are composed of many cute poses by children, including schoolroom scenes, playful scenes and just plain romp and merriment.

"SWEET SUZANNE."—Words by Henry Troy; music by James Reese Europe; published by F. B. Haviland, New York. An excellent song with slides that would make a hit anywhere. In the first place, the models are very good looking. Secondly, unlike many good looking models, they pose very gracefully and naturally, thus lending "personality" to the set. Thirdly, the scenery is very beautiful, colored very strikingly by Scott & Van Altena's experts, who bring the beauties of nature before our eyes with such absolute precision. These three points should make this set very popular.

"THINK IT OVER, MARY."—Words by T. J. Gray; music by Al. Piantadosi; published by Leo Feist. This song has a bright and catchy melody that will surely make a hit. The slides are in harmony with the music—full of beautifully colored, artistic and novel ideas. This set is a fine example of the thought and skill of Scott & Van Altena.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"MAYBE YOU'RE NOT THE ONLY ONE WHO LOVES ME."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by George Botsford; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. A song by these writers which is bound to become popular. Novel lyrics set to a swinging melody cannot fail to please and this song will please for that reason. There are two classes of song slides—those that illustrate and those that are merely ornamental. This set of slides really illustrates the humorous lyrics—tells in pictures the story of the song in an interesting and highly artistic fashion.

"WHEN JUNE ROLLS AROUND WITH THE ROSES."—Words by Will D. Cobb; music by Marie Theresa Laing; published by Shapiro, New York. Will Cobb has written so many hits that criticism of this song is superfluous. The melody, in march time, is full of spirit and well adapted to the swing of the lyrics. As for slides—well, here's the message they carry: A pretty country girl (a pretty one, mind you,) who's "pop" owns a nice fat farm, is enamored of a young man who says he's from New York. He wins her affection, and, who knows, but maybe some of "pop's" long green? At any rate he's called away on business, promising to be back with bells "when June rolls round with the roses." Has he returned? Well, now—he's from New York, which, when translated in this case, means NOT YET. A good set.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"MY SWEET CORDELIA."—Words and music by Shepard N. Edmonds. This number is a pretty love song, such as the house of Haviland knows so well how to make popular. The slides are posed for by colored models and cleverly depict the lover and the sweetheart amid beautiful surroundings. Simpson knows where to find artistic scenery for his pictures, and he goes after it. A glance at this set will prove that fact.

"ARRAH, COME IN OUT OF THE RAIN, BARNEY McSHANE."—By the author of "Colleen Bawn," "Tipperary," "Bit o' Blarney," etc.; published by J. Fred. Helf. An Irish song, full of humor and true Irish wit. This is a good set of pictures. Simpson has outdone himself in depicting the jolly Irish widow and her Barney. The photography is excellent and the surroundings quite out of the ordinary. The coloring is in Simpson's fine style.

"WHO'S LOONY NOW?"—Lyrics by Edgar Selden; music by "Zit," of the Evening Journal. This is the big number that Eva Tanguay, Bobby North and other famous headliners are creating a big sensation with; a song right up to the minute, with a good catchy melody, and bound to create enthusiasm wherever sung. The slides are all novelties of exceptional merit, and will produce a laugh even from the worst pessimist.

"YOU CAN'T MAKE ME STOP LOVING YOU."—Words by Edgar Leslie; music by Kerry Mills. This is a song that already made good, and is now being sung throughout the country. The slides are first class, with some very original novelties. The models are both good looking.

ESSANAY BASEBALL SERIES.

"By far the most interesting film is that which shows Cobb and Wagner meeting for the first time in their lives, illustrating the first handshake of the two greatest ball players living at a game for the world's greatest title. Cobb takes the affair quite seriously, but Wagner nonchalantly waves his hand toward the camera as if to say: "Stop your kidding."

"The film is a great success in that it illustrates the fine points of the game—the sliding, base stealing and pitching maneuvers—with such perfect reproduction of detail that the ball can be seen flying through space as projected from the thrower's hand and by the batter's club."

The tremendous interest centered in the Cubs-Athletics event is ample assurance that the latest Essanay baseball feature will be happily received by the thousands—nay, millions,—of baseball fans from New York to Frisco.

MONTREAL NEWS.

The motion picture business of this city is in a very flourishing condition. Latterly there appears to prevail among the exhibitors a keen desire to compete for prestige, and this is further borne out by the greater amount of advertising space which the motion picture houses are using in the local dailies. Then again they have launched efforts in other directions, such as remodeling of fronts and enlarging and rearranging the seating capacity.

The King Edward Theatre is now undergoing considerable alteration and when the work in hand shall have been completed it will have trebled its seating area. Another new, and what promises to be, a most successful motion picture theatre, has opened its doors to the French populace of the East End. It is called "Le Moulin Rouge" (The Red Mill) and into its construction all the latest and best devices for a well appointed theatre have been made use of. It has a unique position in the heart of a very busy thoroughfare, and in consequence is built on land which is very valuable.

But though the exhibitors are forging ahead in their enterprises, one is tempted to lose sight of the most important adjunct of a good motion picture theatre, namely, the operator. It is therefore interesting to note that the various operators of this city have formed a union to protect their welfare, and have entered the lists of unionism with much enthusiasm. The result of their deliberations were that on Sept. 22 the Moving Picture Operators' Protective Union was organized with the following officers:

President, E. English (Keith's Nickel).

Vice-president, Charlie Desjardin (Prince of Wales).

Treasurer, Mack C. Arless (Lyric Hall).

Recording Secretary, E. Lanthier (Orpheum Theatre).

Financial Secretary, Tom Wilkins (Ourmetoscope).

Business Agent, Chas. Davidson (Francais Theatre).

this particular kind of confidence-game on a careless public?"

The booking-agent knew Dan, and he grinned.

"Not if I can get away with it," he observed, with a chuckle. "Speaking professionally, I consider the moving picture exhibitors the greatest educational and intellectual force of the age. Speaking as man to man, there are more screws loose in the anatomy of these same exhibitors than any screw factory ever turned out in a year. The people howled for the pictures, and they gave them the pictures. Nobody howled for vaudeville, but they gave 'em vaudeville. I'm here to supply the exhibitors' demand. One of these days the show people will wake up to the fact that the majority of the amusement-loving people never had any use for vaudeville, and never will have. When that day comes, I'll be out of a job. But I'm not going to wait for the day. I've got money enough laid by to start out in a new line of amusement, and I'm going to open a first-class moving-picture theatre on Broadway, where there will be no vaudeville."

"And if you want a partner, I'll go in on it with you," said the man from Reno.

LOCAS GAP TO OWN ITS PHOTOPLAY-HOUSE.

In order that Locas Gap, Pa., should have an amusement place this coming winter, the citizens of that prosperous little city held a meeting in the town hall last week for the purpose of bringing a first class photoplayhouse there. The most practical plan suggested by those at the mass meeting, was for the citizens to form a stock company and to sell the stock to the citizens only. It was also suggested that the company purchase a piece of property in the center of the city and there erect a modern photoplayhouse. The only out-of-town people that would be interested in any way, would be a manager and picture machine operator. From the latest reports regarding the movement, it is said that nearly all the stock has been sold, and that the building of the theatre will be started just as soon as plans can be approved.

SELIG NOTES.

Since the first announcement of our forthcoming production of Neil Burgess' celebrated play, "The County Fair," we have had more inquiries as regards the release date, special advertising and effects used, than any similar production in years. So much interest is manifest among the exhibitors especially in the towns and cities where Mr. Burgess is so well known and where he has appeared before delighted audiences, for more than a score of years, that we are convinced that the demand for the subject will be unprecedented in rural drama. Every detail of the production has been put in motion picture and promises many surprises to the admirers of the Selig films.

"Ten Nights in a Bar Room" will be one of our early releases in view of the great demand for the reproduction of the old and standard drama. It has been the object of the Selig Polyscope Company to eliminate the objectionable and overdrawn features of the play and preserve a clear and uplifting picture story that will appeal to the picture-going public in general.

So much has been said of the coming magnificent and colossal classic, "Justinian and Theodora," that there remains little to be done to convince its makers of its assured popularity. When Elbert Hubbard, the sage of East Aurora, was approached by Mr. Selig to become a contributor on his production staff, he assumed an up-stage frown and asked time to think it over. The time was granted, and another interview resulted in the closing of a contract and the production of his master work, "Justinian and Theodora" as played in this country by Sarah Bernhardt and later by Fanny Davenport. This will be a regular release, and not a special as has been reported.

It is with pleasure that the Selig Polyscope Company announces as their Thanksgiving release "The Merry Wives of Windsor," a picture that will appeal to the very best class of patronage and be a fitting subject for a holiday attraction.

"The Vampire," the sensation of the age in motion picture, will be released in a few days. This subject is sure to create international comment, owing to the popularity of the original painting by Sir Burne-Jones and the well-known verses of Rudyard Kipling.

THE VAMPIRE.

A fool there was and he made his prayer—
(Even as you and I)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair—
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool he called her his lady fair—
(Even as you and I).

Oh, the years we waste and the tears we waste—
And the work of our head and hand
Belong to the woman who did not know—
(And now we know that she never could know)
And did not understand.

A fool there was and his goods he spent—
(Even as you and I)
Honor and faith and a sure intent—
(And it wasn't the least what the lady meant)
But a fool must follow his natural bent
(Even as you and I).

Oh, the toil we lost and the spoil we lost—
And the excellent things we planned
Belong to the woman who didn't know why—
(And now we know she never knew why)
And did not understand.

The fool was stripped to his foolish hide—
(Even as you and I)
Which she might have seen when she threw him aside—
(But it isn't on record the lady tried)
So some of him lived but the most of him died—
(Even as you and I).

But it isn't the shame, and it isn't the blame
That stings like a white hot brand—
It's coming to know that she never knew why—
(Seeing at last she could never know why)
And could never understand.

A NOVEL LOBBY DISPLAY

One of the most novel, and at the same time least expensive methods of dressing the lobby of a motion picture theatre that has come to our notice in a long time is a lithographed frame for posters gotten up in various color schemes and different wordings by the Exhibitors' Advertising and Specialty Company. The frame consists of a top piece, reading: "To-day's Newest Feature" or "To-day's Added Attraction," with artistic side panels to match and bottom pieces with appropriate reading matter for both comedy and drama.

These frames exactly fit around the one sheet lithograph posters issued by the various manufacturers of posters for licensed subjects, and are made up to fit regulation standard theatrical size 3-sheet poster boards. They are designed to take the place of the cheap and gaudy fronts which have called forth such unfavorable criticisms from both press and clergy, and are a handsome addition to any motion picture theatre lobby.

For those not wishing to use the film posters in the center of this frame, special insert sheets are designed to match any of the various color schemes with seven different sayings: "A New A. B.," "A New Vitagraph Life Portrayal," "Coming To-morrow," &c.

An idea of how this poster looks may be obtained from a glance at the advertising columns, in which a cut of it appears.

INSTALL POWER'S EQUIPMENT.

The Franklin Amusement Company have just completed the Savoy Theatre, 852 Flatbush avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., which is one of the finest in that city. They have spared no expense in procuring the best equipment in the market. The People's Film Exchange, Columbia Theatre Building, New York City, secured their order for the Power's Cameragraph and Power's Inductor, which has just just been installed in their operator's booth.

Jones, Linick & Schaefer Co., who operate the Orpheum Theatre, 174-176 State street, Chicago, Ill., which is perhaps the largest and the best moving picture theatre in that city, have just purchased through the American Film Service of Chicago a Power's Cameragraph No. 6, after exhaustive tests which proved its superiority to their satisfaction.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Mr. "Ben" Title and Mr. Newbury, of the "T. N. F." Theatre, Flatbush, Brooklyn, were visitors to the Vitagraph Company's studios last week. These gentlemen are Vitagraph neighbors and were especially interested in the inspection of the source of much of their exhibit. They have a large attendance of "Life Portrayal" devotees who frequent the "T. N. F."

The progressiveness of the Vitagraph is the success of its popularity sustained on the merits of its productions. If the mountain will not come to them they will go to the mountain, as evidenced in their portrayals "In the Mountains of Kentucky" and the coal mines of Pennsylvania. These pictures are taken from the places with the coloring and topography of the country where the stories are laid. This past Summer and Fall have been very busy ones; the actors and camera men have been and are still kept on the jump in getting over the country to secure the different scenes in the different parts of the landscape peculiar to the plots of the plays.

"The Deluge" still continues to occupy the Vitagraph staff, and will soon be completed when the ark rests upon Mt. Ararat and Noah and his sons and their wives come forth and give thanks. Watch for the rainbow of promise; this Biblical masterpiece of Vitagraphic service will be ready for exhibition in a very short time.

"Auld Robin Grey," "Davy Jones' Domestic Troubles" and "Clothes Make the Man" are the announcements made for this week; two comedy and a Scotch drama, all quite equal if not superior to anything in this line of motion picture that carries the "V" trade mark, which means they are all right.

A GREAT WHITE WAY

AMERICAN PHOTOPLAYERS IN IRELAND

Experiences of the Kalem Players Told by Miss Gene Gauntier

NOW that the Kalem Company has announced that the trip of its stock company of photoplayers to Ireland, England and Germany was successful, readers of The Film Index will be interested, not only in the pictures, but in the experiences of the players. We are assured that the pictures are fine, and they will all be described and illustrated in these columns as they are released, but what happened to the players on the trip is equally interesting and is worth the telling here. For this purpose we prevailed upon Miss Gene Gauntier, the leading lady of the Kalem players to write it out in her own way and, as she has been writing picture stories for a long time, she has made this story very interesting.

Mis Gauntier, by the way, comes of a talented family. She knows how to do a lot of clever things, and she has a sister, Marguerite Gauntier, who will be heard from in the operatic world one of these days. We mention this fact because Miss Gene accompanied by her mother, attended the operatic debut of Miss Marguerite at Elberfield; which was one of the reasons why the company went to Germany. Also, when one tries to get Miss Gene to talk about the pictures she wants to talk about Marguerite; so we asked her to write it, which gave us a chance to cut out what we didn't want when she was not about. But here's the story:

THE KALEM PLAYERS IN IRELAND.
Mr. Olcott and Miss Gauntier as The Irish Lad and Colleen.

"Well, to begin at the beginning: We left New York on the Baltic Saturday, Aug. 6, and had a most wonderful voyage, for the sea was as smooth as glass, and no one aboard seasick. We took some scenes for "The Lad From Old Ireland' on board, in mid-ocean, and officers and stewards assisted us in every way possible to secure what we wanted. A week after leaving we landed in Queenstown, about midnight. Never will I forget that dreadful night, for there were several hundred passengers landing, and the room for inspecting baggage was about thirty feet square. There were big counters packed six feet high with trunks and hat boxes and, of course, ours was always at the bottom. Then the porters running through with heavy trunks on their shoulders, were absolutely regardless of whether they knocked us down or crushed into the crowd about them. When I secured the stateroom tickets at New York, I answered a question regarding baggage, 'We will not have much; we are traveling light.' I supposed I had spoken the truth until that night, when we totaled fifteen pieces—everyone of which had to be claimed at every stop, and inspected at every border.

"Well; we finally rescued all the luggage and started for a hotel, arriving just too late, for the whole shipload was before us, and at 2.30 a. m. we were confronted with the prospect of no beds. In vain Mr. Olcott and Mr. Hollister tramped the town, while we sleepily waited. All the other five hotels were full. So the landlady (all the hotels are run by women), had a bed put up in a bath room for one of us, and the rest distributed ourselves over various divans in hallways, stair-landings and reception rooms. Needless to say we did not linger long in Queenstown, but left next day in a drizzling rain for Cork.

"One of the most interesting things in Cork is the famous old Church of Shandon, with its beautiful bells. We climbed to the top of the tower, and watched the old bell ringer play them—half a dozen favorite tunes, always ending; as a compliment to Americans, and in memory of our martyred president, with 'Lead Kindly Light.'

"The country around Cork is without a doubt the most beautiful of its kind I have ever seen.

"The rolling hills and wonderful streams, the pastoral effect such as I have seen nowhere else, the quaint little thatched houses, more picturesque than comfortable. It will not be long before they are entirely done away with, for red brick cottages, comfortable, but oh, so ugly, are being built in place of them—and it's proud the people are of the new homes. The first 'Jarvey' we had utterly refused to stop for us to get pictures at a thatched cottage, for, said he, 'its ashamed we are of them, and it's not much longer we'll be havin' the dirty things in Ireland, at all, at all.' Those blessed 'jarvies'; too much could not be written of them, with their rich brogue and ready wit, and big hearts. And how proud they all are of their beautiful country! You win their hearts by a little praise, and they always hasten to add: 'Have yez been up Killarney way? It's there ye'll be seein' pretty country; though I've never been there meself.' However, to my mind the Lakes of Killarney, while beautiful with their rugged hills, are not so lovely as those rolling fields of green near Cork and the silver streams that wend through them.

"We took most of the scenes of 'The Lad From Old Ireland' among the peasants outside of Cork. Those dear old souls. Simple and sweet and wholesome, with their blarneying tongues and generous hearts. Nothing was good enough for us, and they wanted to give us everything we admired in the simple cottages. Every kitchen boasted open cupboards filled with the genuine old willowware of their ancestors, used only for ornament. Seeing that this caught our fancy, nothing would do but we must take away two huge platters. Mr. Olcott praised a quaint clock, over a hundred years old, and so he must carry that away, big and cumbersome as it was.

"We 'made up' in the kitchen, with three dogs and two cats playing 'round us, half a dozen chickens picking off the floor; and a circle of admiring peasants crowding round the doorways, with their exclamations and flattering

CASUAL COMMENT

THE addition by the Edison Company of another reel of pictures to the licensed product is the most important announcement that has been made to the trade in some time. This will bring the licensed product up to an even four reels per day and give the theatres a choice each week of 24 standard reels of the finest photoplays ever made.

In a way the increase of the licensed product will help solve the problem of local theatre competition, in that it will be possible for one house to select a program that will not conflict with the several other houses in the immediate vicinity. It is this difficulty that has compelled many of the so-called "independent" houses to use "independent" pictures. Those houses would welcome any measure that will enable them to return to the licensed service. It is the purpose of the Edison Company to make the third reel a comedy subject, or more properly speaking, to make one-third of the total product comedies. It is comedy subjects that seem to be most sought for just now.

EVERYWHERE the motion picture seems to be in the "public eye," and on the "public mind." While much overheated conversation has been indulged in at one time and another, and no small amount of newspaper space wasted in false testimony against the "photoplay," it is a distinct privilege to know that not all men and all newspapers are unable to deal with the problem—as it seems to them to be—in a fair and unprejudiced manner.

We refer in particular to a most commendatory bit of newspaper work done recently by The Washington Times. It was refreshing to a degree to read the criticisms published by that paper regarding pictures and picture theatres, and coming fair minded men and women. All this after that batch of written to order stuff published by The New York World.

IN justification of its research The Times said editorially on October 7: "The influence of the moving picture show on the mental, moral, and physical welfare of the public has come to be one of the foremost sociological questions of the day. The moving picture probably reaches more people than any other American institution, with the possible exception of the public school and the press. What effect is it having on these millions? Is it doing them good or harm?"

To get reliable, or creditable data on these questions The Times asked eight representative citizens of Washington to investigate and report. The members of the committee were:

Capt. James F. Oyster, member of the school board and former chairman of that body,

C. F. Nesbit, director of the Y. M. C. A.

Mgr. James F. Mackin, rector St. Paul's Catholic Church.

Judge William H. De Lacy, presiding officer of the Juvenile Court.

A. T. Stuart, superintendent of schools.

Mrs. Edna Bushee, truancy officer for the school board.

Rev. John Van Schaick, Jr., pastor of the Church of Our Father.

Dr. W. C. Woodward, District Health Officer.

The reports are all in and we have them before us. Frankly, a fairer verdict could not be asked. Without exception the several opinions are conservative; all find much to commend in motion pictures and none find the picture theatre a menace that should be abolished.

The Film Index regrets that it has not the space to reprint the several reports in one issue, so that its readers might get all at once. But as they are of sufficient importance to deserve circulation among picture theatre managers, they will appear serially beginning with the next issue. Theatre managers will find them particularly useful in combatting radical local movements against the picture theatre.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS

Miss Florence E. Turner, the Vitagraph Girl, is taking a much needed rest at Haines Falls, N. Y.

Schuyler Colfax has been appointed sales manager of the motion picture film department of the Eastman Kodak Co. The Index wishes to acknowledge a very pleasant visit from him.

W. J. Morgan and Mr. Hayden, members of the J. D. Williams Company of Sydney, Australia, were in New York last week on business for that concern. They left Wednesday for London, where a branch office for the purchase of pictures will be established under the management of Mr. Hayden. Mr. Morgan will return to Australia by way of America.

James D. Clarke of Pittsburg, Pa., was in New York last week.

WILLIAMS EXPLAINS

To the Editor Film Index:

Dear Sir—I read your comments in the editorial columns of your paper regarding my letter from Australia, and in reply would like to say that I have not made myself clear regarding the prices of admission charged by theatres over here.

I note where you say that the 5-cent theatres are a thing of the past, and I certainly do agree with you in every way regarding this. There is no chance for a hole in the wall, seating a couple of hundred people (called a theatre), to get any money over in Australia. That is one reason why the motion pictures in America are not looked upon with such good favor by some people. If we elevate the class of place in which pictures are shown we are bound to elevate the businss.

Regarding the price of admission, will say that we charge 3d. (or 6 cents) for the lower floor and 6d. (or 12 cents) for the dress circle; this would make an average price of admission of 9 cents, which is only one cent less than the price of admission they are trying to maintain now in America.

When I speak of high prices in the motion picture business I do not mean 10 cents, but I mean 25, 35 and 50 cents. I don't believe the motion picture business would have ever become so popular in America had you maintained these prices, and I assure you it would not have been so in Australia, as when we first came here a year ago I know beyond the question of all doubt there was not more than 15,000 people going to the picture shows nightly; now in the suburbs of Sydney as well as the city proper there are 50,000 people attending these shows every night, and perhaps a great many more than this. This was all brought about through charging these prices of 3d. and 6d. We are charging practically the same prices as other shows here, as they give a full evenings performance and charge about double the price of admission we do; so you can see we are not lowering the prices, but are merely giving the people a short show for less money.

Some of the other shows here double their price of admission on Saturday night, and if they could read some of the letters that our customers write to us I don't believe they would continue to do this. This is one reason of our success in Australia: we maintain the same price at all times, and see no reason why we should charge any more on a Saturday night or a holiday; however, this is customary over here for nearly all the theatres, but I never could see where there is anything gained in doing it.

I have run 5-cent theatres in America and have made a nice bunch of money out of them; however, in coming over here I have gained a good deal by my experience in America, and I am putting this into effect in Australia in a way that has proved very successful so far, and I must say that I heartily agree with you that the cheap 5-cent theatre is a thing of the past, and the sooner it passes the better it will be for all of us interested in the motion picture business.

J. D. WILLIAMS.

POSITIVELY NO CHANCE

During the past week the daily press dispatches have been burdened with the story of one Eppes Winthrop Sargent, said to be a Chicagoean of wealth, who has enlisted in the U. S. Navy. According to the story said Sargent, attired according to the latest dictates of fashion, the very last whisper of sartorial elegance, drove up to the gates of the navy yard at Philadelphia the other day and presented himself for duty. Immediately there was a stir among the picturemen when the news spread. Was this Sargent our own Epes Winthrop Sargent? Reports from Philadelphia have it that the mail to the office of the Lubin Mfg. Company has been burdened with frantic inquiries on the subject. Could it be that our Sargent has "jined out" with the "flat foots?" But enough; we have it from Sargent himself that he is not the Sargent with money from Chicago, and that the only problems of navigation he ever expects to essay are those relating to the now celebrated "cocktail route." Our artist gives herewith a lifelike impression of our Epes Winthrop Sargent, which we submit as evidence to support our contention that he has positively no chance to join the navy.

PROJECTION DEPARTMENT

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

SOMETHING ALL MOVING PICTURE OPERATORS SHOULD KNOW.

The Principles of Optical Projection.

(Adapted from the Bausch & Lomb Catalog.)

This is a matter which the majority of the operators are not familiar with, and for the benefit of all I submit the following brief review of the leading principles of projection which is designed for the reader, who, having no knowledge of the science of optics, wishes to understand the operation of projection apparatus.

With the aid of the apparatus we throw or project upon a screen an enlarged image of a transparent object (a slide or film).

The process is almost the reverse of ordinary photography. For example, in photographing a scene by means of the photographic objective or lens, we obtain a reduced image of that scene on the ground glass. This glass is replaced by the sensitized plate, ad by the use of chemicals the image is fixed thereon. Now, in projection we reverse this process. From the picture made from the lens we make a transparent slide, or we use the film negatives, and by means of a condensed light we strongly illuminate these, and with an objective lens an enlarged image is projected upon the screen, and this screen image corresponds with the real objects first photographed.

From this illustration it will be seen that the first essential in projection work is the lens or objective. Just as in photography the quality and tone of the picture depend to a very great extent upon the quality and character of the lens, so in projection the objective is the factor which determines the excellence of the screen image.

The optical principle of projection for both lantern slide and moving picture apparatus will, perhaps, be more readily understood from diagram.

At E is an electric light or other suitable illuminant, the light from which is caught up by the condensing lenses or condenser, C; this condenser is an arrangement of lenses so constructed as, firstly, to gather up as great a volume of light as possible, and, secondly, to concentrate the light which it gathers at the center or diaphragm plane of the objective when the objective is located at the proper distance from the film, which distance is determined by the focal length of the objective.

The slide or the film should be placed at such a point that the entire area of the opening is fully illuminated, and it should also be placed so that the greatest number of light rays possible should pass through it. Taking into consideration the fact that the opening in the mat in the lantern slide is 2¼ x 3 inches, and in the moving picture film is 11-16 x 15-16 inches, it will at once be evident that the slide must be placed at the point D in the diagram in order that its entire area be covered, and the moving picture film must be located at the point F, in order that it may take in the greatest number of light rays.

Proceeding from the slide the light passes through the objective, O, where the rays cross and the object is hence reversed, and by means of the objective the object is imaged or delineated upon the sceren, S. The degree of sharpness and flatness of the image depends upon the optical correctness of the lens.

The relative positions of the arc, condenser, and objective must be such that an image of the light will be formed at the diaphragm of the objective. All the light coming from the condenser is then utilized and the image on the screen is at its brightest.

At a given distance the greater the focal length the smaller will be the image. Shorter focus lenses, therefore, will give large images.

Oftentimes lantern slides and films are to be used interchangeably, and approximately the same sized image is desired with both. As the opening in the slide mat is approximately three times that of the moving picture film, it is, therefore, necessary to have a lens for lantern slides approximately three times the focal length of that of the lens used for films. It is possible to match the size of the images in one dimension only (either width or height) as the two openings are not proportionate in size.

The projection distance must be measured from the film or slide to the screen.

Size of Image.—This can be determined by multiplying the difference between the distance from lens to screen and the focal length of the objective, by the size of the slide, and dividing the product by the focal length.

For example:—

Let L be the projection distance, 40 ft. (480 inches); S, the slide mat 3 inches; F, the focus of the lens, 12 inches; then we have the formula (in which D is the size of the image).

$$d = \frac{S\ (L - F)}{F}$$

Substituting for the letters their known values we have,

$$d = \frac{3\ (480 - 12)}{12} = 117\text{-in., or } 9\tfrac{3}{4}\text{ ft.}$$

FOCAL LENGTH.—To determine this factor multiply the size of the slide or film opening by the distance from lens to screen, and divide the product by the sum of the size of the image and the size of the slide.

Thus we have the formula $F = \frac{S \times L}{D + S}$ and substituting their values as before

$$F = \frac{3 \times 480}{117 + 3} = \frac{1440}{120} = 12 \text{ inches.}$$

Distance from Slide to Screen.—With the other factors given we can get this by multiplying the sum of the size of the image and the size of the slide mat, by the focal length, and divide this product by the size of slide mat.

Thus: $L = \frac{F\ (d + S)}{S}$ substituting values:

$$L = \frac{12\ (117 + 3)}{3} = 480 \text{ inches} = 40 \text{ ft.}$$

Next week I will give the table showing the size of image obtained with the lenses of different focal lengths at various distances. This is something that every operator should cut out and put in his note book.

Mistake of Fast Projection.

Much has been said of late about the bad projection at the different picture theatres, but it is not always the operator's fault. The writer had a telephone call last evening to come right over to Brooklyn as the machine was continually breaking down (to use his words), that the machine was no good, that the Film Exchange had buncoed him, and some other things. I suggested several things over the phone, but nothing would do but that I come right over and try to help him out of his difficulty, so over I went.

On my arrival I was told that they were giving the worst picture show in Brooklyn, and after seeing one reel of film run off I was convinced that the proprietor knew what he was talking about, for never in my life have I seen films run so fast as they were that evening, and no occasion for it. While looking at one reel of film, by actual count, the operator stopped five times. I then went up in the booth and after looking the machine over very carefully found that the idler, or roller, on the takeup feed and the upper feed sprocket were of the proper tension, and also that the intermittent idler, or roller, and also the tension springs were of the proper tension, and in fact, the machine was in first-class condition. I must admit that for a minute I was at sea to understand why he should have so much trouble with his machine when all the parts were in A1 condition.

I asked what seemed to be the trouble, and the Manager spoke and said that the film kept continually jumping off, and that the people were commencing to get uneasy and were wondering what was the matter with the show. I only wonder that all the people did not get up in arms and demand their money back, for it was the worst picture show I ever saw in my life (with apologies to the Manager). I stayed there until 10.30 p. m., and during that time I was compelled to ask the operator not to run the machine so fast, as no machine would stand the pace that he was going, let alone the film. The operator said his orders were to grind out three shows per night—five reels and one illustrated song constituted one show, with the exception of the first show, which had an extra illustrated song. This meant that they opened with an illustrated song and closed their first show with an illustrated song. The operator starts his show at 7 p. m. and closes down at

SCENE FROM KALEM SUBJECT "THE ATTACK ON FORT RIDGLEY."

HISTORICAL INDIAN PICTURE.

Kalem Company Presents "The Attack on Fort Ridgley" in Pholoplay Form.

Historical Indian subjects possess a double interest; they have the thrill that is common to all Indian pictures and, at the same time, relate the story of an actual event in the history of the red man in America. Many of the Kalem Indian pictures have possessed this double value. The latest in the long list of similar subjects is about to be released under the title of "The Attack of Fort Ridgley." The story of this picture is told by an eminent writer on the subject of the American Indian and is duly authenticated.

Fort Ridgley was a small military post in the West and the Indians came there to trade. Among them was a comely squaw with whom one of the young officers began a flirtation. The squaw took the affair seriously, so that, when the officer's wife appeared on the scene she became wildly jealous. To gain revenge she incited the members of her tribe to make an attack on the fort, but after she had started the trouble, repented and hastened to warn the people at the post of the impending attack. She was seriously wounded in the attempt and afterward died in the officer's arms.

In presenting this story the Kalem Company have given what seems to be a novelty in the way of scenic effects. In one scene the producer has shown the attack and defense of the fort in one view, giving the interior of the stockade with the soldiers firing through the loopholes, and the exterior with the Indians rushing to the attack. It is a very effective piece of business. Plenty of action and good photography are in evidence throughout.

STRICT FIRE LAWS FOR NORWALK.

Ordinance to regulate the installation, operation and maintenance of motion picture shows in Norwalk, O., are strict in every way. The motion picture machine and apparatus must be located in a fireproof room, with all openings into the room accessible to the public equipped with automatic devices designed to close promptly in case of fire; nothing but electric lights shall be used for lighting purposes; the public room must be equipped with at least two exits from the main floor, and with aisles at least six feet in width; all exits to remain open; the chief of the fire department shall enforce the provisions of the ordinance, and shall arrest the owner or agent of the photoplay theatres who violates any part of the ordinance, the penalty for which is a fine of not less than $10 and not more than $50, or imprisonment for a term of not over thirty days for each offense.

LUBIN IN NEW PLANT.

After Many Vexatious Delays, Immense Factory Is Put in Commission.

Saturday, Oct. 15 was moving day for the Lubin Manufacturing Company and the new factory building 60x250 feet was occupied almost overnight. When the work was shut down at the old plant, 926 Market street on Saturday noon, the heads of staff superintended the removal of the film stock, negatives and chemicals to the new plant at Indiana avenue and Twentieth street, Monday morning the day shift reported for duty and the work proceeded without a hitch. For the past four weeks a small staff has been employed in the new place testing the machines and looking after the innumerable details and, as a result, there were no delays when the full force arrived.

The huge studio building was occupied early in May and has been in full running order throughout the summer, but it was decided not to essay the removal of the mechanical and photographic staffs until everything was ready for them and it was not until the last problem had been solved that the staffs were transferred.

SCENE FROM MELIES SUBJECT "GENEROUS CUSTOMERS."

TWO GOOD MELIES COMING.

"Birthday Cigars" and "Generous Customers" Are Two Exceedingly Clever Comedies of Surpassing Merit.

Melies release for November 3 affords us two snappy comedies on one reel—"Birthday Cigars," and "Generous Customers." The first of these touches on the "Damm Family." There is joy and at the same time much confusion in the Damm household when the news arrives that the rich uncle is about to pay his poor relatives a visit. Here is a chance for the latter to show him every courtesy, and perhaps by that action to be mentioned in his will. But did anyone ever count on anything, but that the unexpected happened? So in this case. Dear old lady Damm purchases a box of cigars for her rich relative's enjoyment. Was it her fault that another person purchased a box of trick explosion cigars, and that while the two packages were wrapped up side by side, the country drunk should come in and interchange them? That to be sure, was the unexpected, and rich old uncle Damm was given a rather noisy reception. In fact he no sooner blew in than he was blown out.

Alas! for the poor Damm family.

Generous Customers.

That business was "on the fritz" in a small restaurant on a country road was evident by the waiter's insolence toward his employer. He demanded pay or threatened to quit. But how could the proprietor pay him when no one came to eat? Imagine the joy of those two souls when an automobile party stops for dinner. They cannot lavish enough attention upon their guests and in trying to do so frequently bump into each other with various mishaps. The wine at that dinner was good and proprietor and waiter had their share—on the quiet of course, but who should pay the bill? Both men in the party were over-zealous to do so and insisted that the other should not. Finally the girl in the party suggested that they blindfold the proprietor and waiter and that the one who either of these might lays his hands upon first should pay the bill. Capital idea! But when they had the waiter and proprietor blindfolded one of the party proposed that they all "skidoo." This was easily accomplished, and waiter and proprietor who had only found each other arrived upon the scene just as the automobile party was leaving.

Utter dejection again and loss of faith in mankind! A good dinner to the bad and not a red "soo" in sight. What Ho! a telegraph boy:

"Dear Sirs, enclosed find check for $40 for our dinner and extra bit of fun."

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S. McQuade

IN my letter, in the issue of October 15, which treated of the evils of the dark picture theatre and of the benefits to be derived from a well-lighted auditorium, I requested the managers or owners of houses who had installed the improved curtain and lighting system, to send in their names, the names of their houses and of the towns in which they are located, to the home office of The Film Index, or to the Chicago office. Thus far I have received but one letter; not that there are only a few picture theatres which come up to the requirements, but either that managers and owners are apathetic in the matter, or that they have not read the article in question.

Any movement that makes for the uplift and better standing of the picture theatre in every community should be strenuously supported, and I know of no other at the present time which is so worthy of such support as the abolishment of the dark auditorium. The names of the numerous, well-lighted picture houses throughout the country, if prominently published, together with a statement of the increased business which has attended the improvement, will go far towards inducing others to let their light also shine. And, as the number of lighted theatres increases, so in direct ratio will the pressure brought to bear on dark theatres increase, for right-minded patrons will attend the lighted theatre rather than the dark one.

The following letter, sent me by S. B. Sampson, manager of the Princess theatre, Anderson, Ind., bears out the foregoing statement, and it should bring out a long series of letters from other managers and owners of lighted picture houses:

"We have been very much interested in the subject of light 'photoplay' theatres and desire to compliment The Film Index on the publicity it has been giving this question.

"When we opened our theatre, on the 20th of last January, it was provided with sufficient light to overcome Miss Richardson's objections, and also to raise objections from patrons of other houses who had been in the habit of going to these places, not to see the pictures, but to be unseen. The result was, that a very large percentage of the best people in Anderson soon became regular patrons of our house, while the others stayed away. The best people appreciated light; the undesirables didn't, and the management appreciated the results of light.

"Later on, we installed an aluminum screen and put in more light. The result: more favorable comment.

"One of our competitors, whose house was very dark, sold out. The new manager, seeing the benefit of light in our house, lighted his, and only a few days ago began advertising his house as the only lighted theatre in the city. Of course, the knowing ones laughed, as a 'light' house was unknown in Anderson before the advent of The Princess. However, we congratulate him on his 'light' house and wish him success."

Hear the Other Side.

It has been said that the optimist and the pessimist are both necessary to preserve equilibrium in the world of thought and action; but I believe the great majority will side with me in lining up with the optimist. A little of pessimism goes a long way, and it requires a great deal of optimism to rid the air of the snarl and whine and negation of the man, or woman, who can see microscopic evil with the natural eye, but who requires a microscopic eye to see the good anywhere, or in anything.

In these days, when it is qute the thing to pitch into the motion picture theatre and to call it all kinds of names, and impute to it all kinds of evil, its truly refreshing to read something that shows you that place of entertainment in its true light. And in such simple, delightful, homelike fashion, too, where the writer worms himself into your confidence in the first three short paragraphs, and makes you believe in him, for the very reason that he believes thoroughly in himself and sees and believes in the good all around him.

I don't think I've ever read anything that has so impressed and pleased me, as the editorial in the Kansas City "Star," of October 1, on the nickel theatre. Certainly nothing in the motion picture line. It is a literary gem and, what is still more important, it is the simple truth. It gives you at a glance the value of the motion picture, both for entertainment and education, and you realize, before the closing paragraph is finished, that a new thing has come into the life of the human race that can no more be dispensed with than warmth, light, love or happiness.

Following is the editorial and its heading:

WHAT NICKEL THEATRE DOES.

"How long since you've been to the nickle theatre?

"Have you ever been at all?

"Get that good little family of yours together this very evening and go.

"Never mind which theatre you choose; take the one that's nearest to where you live and go out for a pleasant, good-natured, instructive evening—for five cents apiece.

"Put on little sister's new fall hat. Help mother button little brother into his brand new fall suit, tell grandpa to get out his best glasses and go—all of you, from the baby up.

"O, yes, they allow babies in the nickel theatre. You'll see a good old family dog or so lying down under the seats waiting for his folks—that's the beauty of the nickel theatre—it's meant for the people, just the plain everyday people like you and me and the rest of us. You don't have to spend an hour dressing when you want to go there, and nobody is going to turn an opera glass on you and wonder where on earth you got that hat and what you've done with your diamonds.

"You'll not only have a good time at the nickel theatre, but you're apt to learn something, too.

"Ten to one those moving pictures will take you down to Panama—to let you see them building the big canal, or over to Africa to hunt lions, or down south to watch them picking cotton, or up to Alaska to slip up along a great seal beach and look at the old leader seal marshaling his flopping flock up to the rocks. Maybe they'll take you out into the scented orchard to watch the farmer making cider and perhaps you and grandpa and little brother won't have a good time, talking over the maneuvers after you've seen the pictures of life in the American army in the Philippines.

"Don't stay at home and think over what a mean partner you've got or how unreasonable your customers are. Don't lean over the fence and talk about the neighbors; get out—get out of the narrow rut; out of the stifling slavery of fixed ideas—and take your family with you.

"If there's anything in the show you don't like, drop the manager a post card and tell him about it; he's anxious to please you and the rest of the neighbors.

"Don't let him show your boys murder pictures and slum pictures. Don't let your little growing girl sit and watch pictures of things that she only half understands and goes home and wonders about. Keep the nickel show in your own neighborhood clean—keep it honest—keep it wholesome. It's part of your children's schooling, remember, and part of your own, too.

"Encourage the manager to have a little good music along with the pictures, lively tunes, ragtime and some of the old songs once in a while, too. Nobody's a bit worse for humming the refrain of 'My Old Kentucky Home' under his breath once in a while, and if there's anything that'll make you think of the days when you believed in people and thought the world was just a great big play-ground, it's to sit and shut your eyes and join in the chorus of 'My Poor Nellie Gray'—even if you don't dare sing above a whisper.

"The nickel show is as much a part of our lives now as the gas range and the street car. Let's keep it clean and wholesome and honest and decent and let's help to make it prosperous—you and I and the rest of the neighbors.

"Come along, let's all go to the nickel show—and learn something."

Edison Pictures of St. Louis Aviation Meet.

James H. White, representative at large of the Edison Manufacturing Co., stopped over in this city Tuesday, last week, on his return trip to New York from St. Louis, where he had been attending the Aviation Meet, held there from Oct. 8 until Oct. 17.

Pictures of the entire meet were taken by the Edison Co., under Mr. White's supervision, the famous flight of Colonel Roosevelt in Arch Hoxey's aeroplane being included. It is not known at present whether one or two full reels will be required for these pictures; but it is certain that the most daring and successful flights ever made by heavier than air machines were caught by the Edison cameras at St. Louis and that, possibly, not less than two reels will suffice to chronicle the sensational events in pictures.

Mr. White has an aversion to publicity that bodes but little satisfaction to an interviewer, but from his old time friend, George Kleine, I gleaned a few facts that will be interesting. Mr. White, who is a "braw chiel" of some six feet and a few inches, was manager of the Kinetograph department of the Edison Manufacturing Co. from 1895 until 1903. In the latter year he went to Europe, making headquarters in London, and had charge of the entire Edison interests there until 1908, when he returned to America.

Mr. Kleine was started off in Edison films, machines, etc., in 1898, by Mr. White and was appointed general Western dealer of the Edison Company in that year. It took some tall talking to get Mr. Kleine to accept the appointment in those days, as Mr. White can testify, and ever since both gentlemen have been close personal friends, apart from business.

The Cubs and Athletics Series.

The National-American series of pictures which are being produced by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co., have created widespread interest and, from present indications, a record-breaking number of prints will be required to meet the demand from all parts of the country.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S CLEMENCY"

A Stirring Patriotic Subject by Pathe's American Players—"The Woman of Samaria"

PATRIOTIC subjects always touch a responsive chord. Thrilling war dramas have always received the stamp of popular approval. With these facts in mind it must be conceded that the Pathe American producers have made a happy choice in the subject and title of a patriotic picture soon to be released. "Abraham Lincoln's Clemency" is the title selected and the story is that of a young soldier, condemned to be shot for neglect of duty, who is saved at the last moment by executive interference. The incident is not without parallel in the annals of the Civil War, and has been worked out by the Pathe stock company with painstaking effort.

In the first scene is shown the soldier who has been detailed for picket duty after a long and exhausting march; he goes to sleep and is thus discovered by the corporal of the guard. An alarm is given which brings an officer of the guard and the delinquent picket is put under arrest. Subsequently a Court Martial passes sentence of death; the penalty for such infractions of duty.

In such cases there was but one final court of appeal—the President. Many such cases were brought to the notice of President Lincoln during the war, and it is a matter of record that he granted his pardon in a large number of them. When appealed to for pardon in these cases, usually by the wives and mothers of the condemned men, President Lincoln was always deeply affected. While desiring with all his heart to save a life, he could not forget the necessities of discipline so important in a great army, and he is said to have remarked that the hardest duty he was called upon to perform was to approve the sentence of death upon some poor soldier whose life was to be sacrificed to discipline.

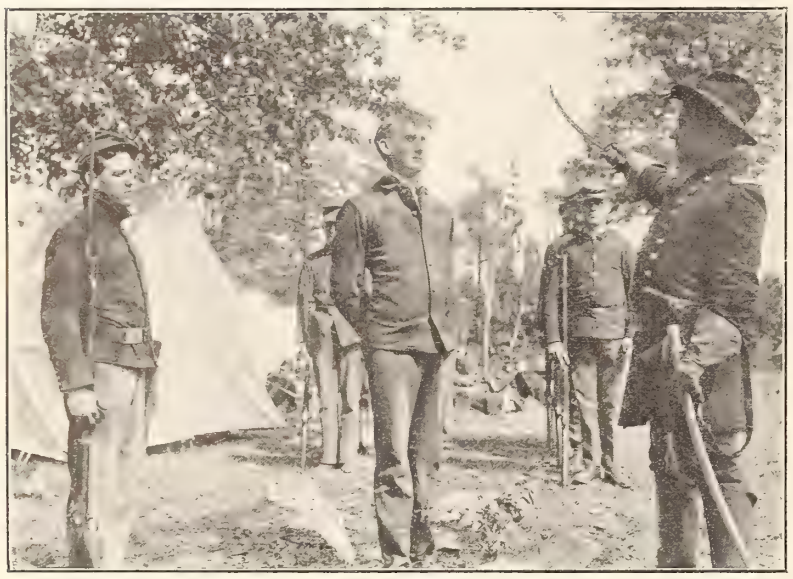
From the soldier, condemned to die for his neglect of duty, the picture carries us to Washington where President Lincoln, seated in his office in the White House, is reading the appeal for clemency penned by a heart-broken mother. The Pathe players have given a splendid impersonation of President Lincoln—a true portrait. There is dignity in the pose and the burden of sorrow in his heart is plainly drawn upon the stern and rugged features.

Seated at a table the President struggles with the question before him. With him the life of one man is of the greatest significance—greater at the time than momentous questions of State. As he struggles for the right solution he seems to see the mother of the boy condemned to be shot to death in prayerful attitude. This decides him.

Returning to the camp of the army preparations are being made for the execution. The culprit is brought forth and the firing squad told off and all march away to the place of death. Drawing his sabre the officer in command is about to give the fatal order when he is arrested by the sound of galloping horses. In another moment an orderly dashes up and commands delay; he is quickly followed by a carriage, from which steps the tall form of the President. The soldier boy is saved. The scene is an affecting one and well portrayed.

In the scenes that follow a battle occurs between the opposing forces. Our soldier boy rushes bravely into the thick of the fight, grabbing the flag from a fallen color-bearer. In the melee that follows he is desperately wounded and falls amid a heap of the slain. A night scene follows showing a search for the living and the wounded hero is found. With a last effort he attempts to rise, supported by the searchers. But his is a mortal wound and with the approach of death there comes to him the vision of the man who saved him from disgrace and a nameless grave.

The picture closes with an allegorical scene illustrating the union of the North and South—a beautiful conception.



SCENES FROM PATHE'S AMERICAN SUBJECT "ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S CLEMENCY."

THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA

A Pathe Hand-Colored Religious Subject of Surpassing Beauty and Reverence

It is almost superfluous to add words of praise in describing a Pathe religious subject. Of the numerous pictures of this character produced by Pathe all have been examples of the highest degree of the picture maker's art from a technical point of view, and at the same time, have possessed a certain dignity and reverence of subject that has placed them fairly in the category of religious teachings. In this respect the latest production of this character is no exception.

"The Woman of Samaria" is adapted from the fourth chapter of the Gospel according to St. John, and follows the text of the Scripture very closely. According to the story Jesus is compelled to leave Judea because of a violent controversy upon the question of baptism, and sets out for Galilee, passing through Samaria. The opening scene shows the departure of the Saviour and his disciples from Judea, at which time he causes the lame to walk and the blind to see.

Following the steps of Christ and his disciples the picture leads one to the towns in Samaria and thence to Jacob's Well, where a stop was made for rest and refreshment. The party had not been well received while -passing through the Samarian village, and the disciples were in a disputatious frame of mind when the stop was made. Christ quiets them and then sends them on a search for food. During their absence the Samarian woman comes to the well for water. He convinces her that he is the Messiah and she hastens back to the town to tell the people. Subsequently the Samarians receive Christ and he remains among them for two days teaching and healing the sick.

Many beautiful scenes testify to the great care the producers have taken to make this subject a work of art. There is dignity in the portrayal of the revered personality of the Saviour, and the characteristics of the several disciples are so marked as to be distinguishable to students of the Bible. These features will not fail to claim the attention of teachers of religion and to add "The Woman of Samaria" to the list of photoplays suitable for church and Sunday-school use.

ROYAL PHOTOPLAY HOUSE HAS SWELL OPENING.

The Royal Theatre, formerly the Bijou, Marquette, Mich., now owned by C. S. Sullivan, had a successful opening Wednesday, Oct. 5. Mr. Sullivan played to three packed houses and from 7 until 9 o'clock there was a crowd assembled in front of the theatre, waiting to enter. Four picture subjects were presented. Difficulty was experienced in operating the fans, so that the house was not as cool as Mr. Sullivan expects to have it after the ventilating system is in proper running order.

Mr. Sullivan, who has been in the show business for more than twenty-five years, knows the motion picture game from start to finish. He has made a great improvement in the appearance of the house, and it is one of the best lighted motion picture theatres in the upper peninsula.

Mr. Sullivan plans on opening a theatre in Negaunee. He was over there yesterday, looking up a location, and if he is successful in finding a room to suit him he states that he will begin work at once putting it in condition for a theatre.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

SOME people are under the impression, that, in order to become an excellent piano player they must master sight reading, and I agree with them if they expect to follow concert work, but my advice to those wishing to become picture pianists, is throw away your music and "fake," as you can never play pictures as long as you are obliged to keep your music in front of you.

I was much amused at a little incident that happened in a picture house in the southern part of Indiana. The energetic young lad that presided at the ivories was making a great effort to accompany the pictures with appropriate music. He had two pieces in his repertoire, one for comedy scenes and one for dramatic scenes. If a picture opened with a dramatic scene, it never failed that his rag time score was in front of him, and by the time he had his correct music in place, the scene would be over.

You cannot expect to sort out your music during the showing of a picture and hold your audience to the scenes portrayed.

There are a few scenes in some of the comedy pictures where you can use strains from popular songs, but this can easily be overdone and if you give them too much of it the audience soon tires of you and an electric piano could take your place as far as the audience is concerned.

With the dramatic scenes it is different. During the showing of a heavy dramatic production, popular music is out of the question, unless you have a chance to use some of those good old tunes such as "Silver Threads Among the Gold," "My Old Kentucky Home," "Annie Laurie," etc. They are the pieces that reach home, if there is anything on earth that will hold an audience, it is one of those tunes. But don't force them on the picture, wait your chance, wait until some good picture comes along that you can use one of them.

Do you remember the Biograph release of August 8th. "The House With Closed Shutters?" There was your chance for "My Old Kentucky Home." Let us take this picture as an example. Can you imagine a more pathetic scene than the closing of the picture where the old negro comes on the porch of the stately colonial mansion and closes the shutters, never to be opened again, and when the strains "By and by Hard Times Comes a Knocking at the Door," then, "My Old Kentucky Home Good Night," reaches the ears of the audience, every man, woman and child, in their mind repeats those famous lines, they not only repeat the words of the song with the action of the picture, they can picture the sorrow that is behind those closed shutters and can see that broken hearted mother protecting the family name. In this case the music has been as great a feature as the picture. but, you must take in consideration, you cannot place the music for "My Old Kentucky Home" on the piano and play it as it is written. You must be original, you must create and use expression. You must not try to make the picture fit your music you must make the music fit with the picture. Try and cultivate a sympathetic touch if you ever expect to make good in playing pictures.

As an example, for a good comedy picture, one that you can use several popular tunes during the showing and not overdo the thing, we will take the Edison release of August 26, "The Valet's Vindication." About the third scene in the picture is where Kirby, the valet, is awaiting the arrival of a number of friends, he has invited in to spend the evening. The table is well supplied with refreshments, cigars, poker chips, etc., and the audience will repeat the lines with you "It Looks Like a Big Night To-night," you have won your first point. The next scene shows the Valet the morning after the party, considerably the worse for the wear, and asleep at the table. If you will play just a few strains from "The Morning After the Night Before" it will make every man in the audience, want to hand Kirby a cold towel and a pitcher of ice water. You have won your second point. Two points are enough in this picture, it is well to remember not to run a good thing in the ground. During the showing of the balance of the picture play some lively air until you come to the last scene, where, Beekman and Miss Bradley have been married and are enjoying their first home breakfast, with Kirby as a sort of a guardian angel of the household, then play "The Waning Honeymoon" from "The Time, the Place and the Girl" until the close of the picture. In my next article I will show a few points where the average drummer is a handicap to the musician playing pictures. Drums are well enough in certain parts of pictures, but they are a detriment when used through the entire show.

IMPORTANCE OF PROPER MUSIC.

Observing the subject of music for pictures by practical experience the Rev. Geo. A. House, comments upon the articles written by Clyde Martin for The Film Index on "Playing the Pictures" in the following communication:

To the Editor The Film Index:

Dear Sir—Permit me to express my pleasure in connection with Clyde Martin's series of articles on "The propor music for motion pictures." Nothing will assist in raising the tone of the motion picture enterprise better than good music. The ding-dong of the ragtime one has to listen to during the displays at the average theatres is not only unattractive, but irritating to the sensitive ear. I am just having an interesting experience on that line.

Last week I began a series of six scenic educational illustrated lectures at one of the churches in the Oranges. During the first evening the music provided by the church committee was of the usual show character. At the close of the entertainment I appealed to the committee for a change in the musical part of the programme. They expressed an inability, but gave to me the privilege, if I desired, to arrange for the music.

On reaching home I asked my daughter to save the situation and preside at the piano during the remainder of the series.

This change has increased the interests and the audiences marvelously, until I am not sure which is the greater attraction, the music or the pictures.

Selections from the best composers, Rubenstein, Mendelssohn, Beethoven and others are used and brought in to suitable, simultaneuos accord with the kinetoscope displays. In connection with the lighter dramatic subjects, the Merry Widow Waltz and similar selections give a charming tone to the entertainment.

My daughter watches with great interest every movement on the screen, and brings out the life of the picture with intense meaning.

Motion picture managers who desire to attract the eye and retain the patronage of the more cultured classes must themselves take a deep interest in the music, and employ only those who will throw soul into expression and melody. I am yours,

GEORGE HOUSE,
Edison Lecturer and Demonstrator.

George Hourtby, of Carsonville, Mich., will open a motion picture theatre in that village within the next few weeks.

Bert Silver has leased the Family theatre, Greenville, Mich., for the season. The house will be thoroughly repainted before the opening night.

The first motion picture show in Charleston, N. H., opened Sept. 25.

Max Kantak, of Milwaukee, Wis., has obtained a permit to build a picture theatre on Lincoln avenue. The structure will cost $4,500.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

Summary of Electrical Talk No. 8.—The alternat-with a given number of rotating magnet poles at a ing current generator is an electric machine infixed speed. If the speed is doubled, the number of which by the magnetism from rotating pole piecescycles per second is also doubled. The number of currents are induced in copper coils, surrounding softcycles may also be doubled by increasing the number iron cores influenced by the rotating magnet poles. of rotating poles to twice the number or the same An alternating current electric generator can befrequency may be obtained by doubling the number of made to deliver a certain number of cycles per secondpoles and cutting the speed in two.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 9

Having formed a clear idea of how alternating current is generated in a copper coil surrounding a soft iron core under the influence of a rotating magnet, I herewith call your attention to Figure 13 which is a diagramatic representation of an alternating current electric generator. The machine is mounted on a base and is composed of a magnet frame, usually made from cast iron, within which is clamped iron cores made of thin sheets of soft iron or special magnetic steel. This soft iron core is so made that copper wire coils can be mounted on projections forming soft iron core pole pieces which do not hold or maintain any magnetism excepting at the instant when one of the rotating magnet poles passes by it.

Upon a main shaft is mounted a pulley and two or more magnet poles which are always magnetically charged when the machine is to generate current.

By means of a pulley or direct connection to an engine or other source of power, the shaft and the magnet poles are rotated at high speed acting magnetically upon the stationary soft iron cores, transmitting alternately north and south pole magnetism to the cores, thereby inducing a current to flow in the copper wire coils, which are connected to the terminals at the top of the generator through which the current generated may be supplied to the switchboard in the power house and then to the line.

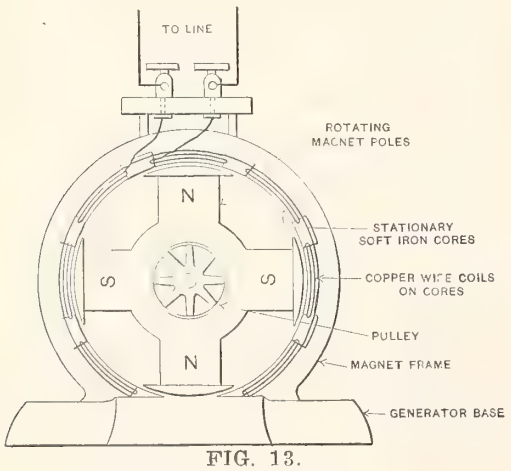

FIG. 13.

If the generator illustrated in Figure 13 operates at the speed of 1,800 revolutions per minute we find from the rule in the synopsis of "Electrical Talk No. 8," that we should multiply the speed by the number of rotating pole pieces, which in this case is 4 making the calculation as follows:

1,800 R. P. M. x 4 pole pieces = 7,200 alternations per minute. If we wish to reduce this figure to cycles divide 7,200 by 2 which equals 3,600 and divide this by 60 seconds equals 60 cycles.

In making the diagrammatical sketch, Figure 13, I have not attempted to make an actual representation of a generator but one which would plainly illustrate the different parts of the generator and their function. You can understand, of course, that there may be any number of pole-pieces and the design may be changed to suit the particular ideas of the designer.

It has been stated that the current leaves the generator at the terminals and is transmitted through highly insulated cables to the switchboard. I wish to call your attention to the fact that alternating currents are usually generated at voltages varying from 1,000 up to 6,600 volts, and you can understand that on account of the high voltage windings being stationary, therefore not subject to excessive vibration and also on account of having more room than on an ordinary rotating armature, it is possible to put on a greater quantity of insulation on the copper wire, which forms the magnet coils, and there is also plenty of room for insulation between the coils and the soft iron cores, permitting the high voltage above mentioned to be generated and sent to the switchboard without any danger either to the man who handles the machine or to the machine itself.

I have illustrated the rotating magnet poles without complication and you may imagine that the poles are made from hardened steel magnetised so as to form permanent magnets. In practice, however, it has been found to be more economical and preferable to put a copper coil on each one of the rotating magnet poles. The coils are connected in series and the two terminals are then connected to, two "Collector Rings"—mounted on the shaft which rotate with it. Two copper gauze or carbon brushes rest one on each collector ring and direct current from a storage battery or from a small direct current generator usually called the "Exciter" is supplied to the brushes allowing the direct current to flow from the Collector Rings, through the magnet coils on the rotating poles, which are thereby magnetised to any desired extent under the control of the dynamo attendant who can increase or decrease by means of a field rheostat the voltage and current delivered by the "Exciter."

Figure 14 illustrates the rotating magnet and Collector Rings, when the field magnets are excited by magnet coils through which direct current is flowing from a small direct current generator.

Summary.

Large alternating current generators are usually made with a number of rotating magnet poles, alternately of north and south pole magnetism.

On account of the difficulty of securing a permanent magnet of large size and also on account of the impossibility of regulating the strength of the magnetism from a permanent magnet; the pole pieces of an alternating current generator are usually magnetised by copper coils, through which direct current flows.

The magnet poles of an alternating current, generator, have to be supplied with direct current, which is usually furnished by a very small direct current dynamo or generator, which is provided with its own field rheostat by means of which the attendant in the power house can increase or decrease the voltage of the small generator, or "Exciter," thereby increasing or decreasing the current flowing in the magnet coils on the magnet poles of the larger alternator, which in turn increases or decreases the voltage of the alternating current delivered by the alternating current generator.

In our next talk we will discuss the "Transformer" for alternating current.

BOSTON OPERATORS UNION PROGRESSIVE.

Motion Picture Machine Operators Protective Union, Local 182, of Boston, Mass., which was organized last April, is reported to be at the height of prosperity. Since the union formed, there has been absolute harmony between the members and the picture theatre managers. The organization has its own business office right in the heart of the theatrical district, and when a manager wants an operator, he 'phones to the office and his needs are attended to immediately. The union is much indebted to the General Film Exchange Co., of Boston, for the manner it has stood by the operators.

The officers for the year are: J. J. Barry, president; Max Goodman, vice-president; Lawrence Tempest, financial and corresponding secretary; Harry Danto, recording secretary and treasurer, and Bernard Corbett, business agent. The executive board consists of J. J. Barry, Max Goodman, Lawrence Tempest, Harry Danto and Thad Barrows.

MEXICO, MO., WILL HAVE NEW HOUSE.

Work on the new photoplay house, Mexico, Mo., is being rushed with all rapidity, as the manager, B. A. Powell, wants to open within the next few weeks. The house is being constructed on lines the same as those of the large cities, and will, when finished, be as modern as any house in Missouri. The house will be strictly fireproof. Manager Powell will install a new machine.

NEW HOUSE FOR SOUTH BERKELEY.

A building permit has been granted by the building board of Berkeley, Cal., to W. Krahn to erect a first-class photoplay theatre. The theatre will be located on the west side of Adeline street, just north of Sixty-third street, which is in the best business part of the town.

The house will have a seating capacity of over 600. The stage will be large enough to accommodate large traveling companies; but for the present only the best of motion pictures will be used. It is the intention of the management to run as many first run pictures as he can get.

"THE FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE"

A Delightful Comedy Drama by Essanay

JAS. S. McQUADE

I VISITED the Essanay plant one day last week and, by appointment with my friend, Mr. McMackin of the publicity department, was treated to a view of the negative of "The Fortunate Misfortune," finished about two weeks ago, and to be released Tuesday, November 8.

At this point it is pertinent to remind the reader that the Essanay release days will be Tuesday and Saturday, instead of Wednesday and Saturday, as heretofore, the change to take place Nov. 1.

There was an extra interest in this film for me, from the fact that it is the first comedy to be released in which Essanay's new Eastern stock company has appeared, and I felt much the same as an invited guest at a friend's house celebrating the advent of his first born.

FRANK HEARS GOOD NEWS.

FRANK AND HIS NEW FRIENDS.

SCENES FROM ESSANAY'S SUBJECT.—"A FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE."

Producer Harry McRae Webster was on hand at the presentation and, although modest, he was just as proud as a fond father ought to be on such an occasion. And he and all the Essanay people have a right to be proud of "The Fortunate Misfortune," for it has a strong, well-knit story of powerful appeal to the best that is in human nature, and every connecting link of that story is admirably mirrored in the pictures.

No claim is made that "The Fortunate Misfortune" is a great film; but it can be confidently predicted that it will make a stirring appeal to the great masses of the people, and that its popular theme and true-to-life incidents and situations will commend it to all who appreciate the holding of the mirror up to Nature.

Except in a few instances, I was struck by the effective, subdued acting of the members of the Essanay company in this pictured comedy-drama, a something on which Producer Webster is to be congratulated. Moreover, the critical observer will note with pleasure the skillful manner in which the story is developed, by the introduction of the scenes best fitted to tell it connectedly and realistically. Every exhibitor may be certain that he cannot boom this full reel comedy too strongly in advance, as it is bound to come up to all expectations—and more.

A wealthy young fashionable, Frank Willoughby, becomes engaged to the leading belle of his set, Vivian Marlow. She and her mother, the latter especially, worship at the shrine of Mammon. The event is the main topic in society circles, and Frank is showered with congratulations at his club and elsewhere.

To mark appropriately the announcement of his engagement, Frank gives a fashionable reception at his home. In the midst of the festivities, his valet brings him a telegram, which bears the news that he has lost his entire fortune by a crash in Wall street. Stunned, he communicates the misfortune to his fiancee and, while she sympathizes with him, her mother approaches, lifts the telegram, which Frank has let fall to the floor, and, reading it, commands Vivian to accompany her home. The other guests soon learn of Frank's ruin and gradually melt away until he is left alone with his faithful valet.

Next morning the newspapers give glaring accounts of the slump on Wall street and Frank's former associates in business give him a wide berth. He calls at the home of his fiancee, but the butler turns him away by the words, "Not at home." He visits the club and is chillily received by some and ignored by others. His household effects are auctioned and the proceeds used to pay off his servants, all of whom show sorrow for his reverses. He pays his loyal valet the wages due, and recommends him to seek another master. The valet tries to reject the amount, but is forced to accept. Then he puts his foot down and tells his master that he cannot be discharged from his service. At this juncture the iceman comes in and requests Frank to subscribe for two tickets to the icemen's ball. The price of the tickets takes the last two dollars in Frank's possession.

Next night, Frank and his valet attend the ball, where the former meets a young girl by whom he is strangely impressed. The days following are spent in a fruitless search for work. At his wit's end, Frank is despairing, when he chances to come across his old acquaintance, the iceman. He tells the latter of his anxiety to find work of any kind, and is at once guided to the office of the ice factory, where he is employed and given a pair of tongs to assist the friend who has gotten him the position.

On his daily rounds, he chances to call at the home of the girl, whom he had met at the ball, and all his first impressions are revived with twofold strength. It is a case of mutual love at first sight, and, soon afterwards, we see Frank and his girl wife in a humble cottage, with life all sunshine and toil a pleasure.

And next a rift is rent in the clouded financial sky that lowered over Frank's fortunes. His devoted valet, who has never lost sight of him, brings a newspaper, one day, which contains news of the sudden and enormous increase in value of certain mining stocks which Frank holds and had long believed worthless.

From a bankrupt, Frank springs to the level of a millionaire, and once more we see him amid luxurious surroundings. His plebeian wife and mother are there, and so are the joyous valet and the muscular iceman. And all seem quite in place, for "The rank is but the guinea's stamp; the man's the gowd for a' that."

FLATBUSH PICTURE HOUSE A SUCCESS.

Flatbush, Brooklyn, New York, is enjoying its first experience with an actual theatre in its midst, in the opening of the Savoy vaudeville and motion picture theatre, on Flatbush avenue. There have been many attempts to start a theatre in Flatbush and several companies were formed, but it remained for the Abels-Gold company to give Flatbush its first one.

Judging from the manner in which the people of Flatbush have received the new amusement place and are nightly and daily patronizing it, the day is not far distant when another theatre on a larger scale will be built there.

The Savoy is under the personal management of Mr. Clinton and will seat more than four hundred persons. The management prides itself on the fact that the place is absolutely fireproof. The only wood used is the flooring, but that is laid on steel girders and is amply protected.

A very imposing entrance and a large lobby brilliantly lighted suggests the large theatres down town. Since its opening September 26 it has played to crowded houses. High class vaudeville talent is engaged, while the pictures are the latest productions.

"THE NINE OF DIAMONDS"

A Vitagraph Portrayal of a Stirring Episode of California and the Civil War

IN the forties of the Nineteenth century life in California in the time of the gold "fever" was very much like that of Alaska in recent years, although climatic conditions were just the opposite. Men of every phase of character from all quarters of the world flocked to the "golden state" to seek their fortune or make a stake. Gambling was the chief pastime and every body got in the game.

It was in an exciting game of cards one night when Hammond Floyd drew the winning cards and trimmed Jenkins and his gang to the tune of their last sou. Jenkins had his "pards" waylay Hammond. He is rescued by Hank Garland, a prospector and by him is nursed back to health and strength. A strong friendship has grown up between the two men and on the parting of their ways Floyd tears a nine of diamonds in halves, gives Garland one half and keeps the other himself, telling Garland should he ever be in need of his friendship he would gladly answer his call on presentation of his half of the card.

Years afterward Hank Garland's son is drafted in the "War of the Rebellion." The father gives his boy his half of the nine of diamonds after telling him about it and that it may be of service to him at some time.

The boy is entrusted with a war message and in its delivery is arrested by the Confederates, one of whom happens to be his father's old Californian friend, Floyd. The boy is placed under his guard. He searches the young fellow and finds the half of the card, lets the boy escape and suffers the death penalty for his act of friendship and debt of gratitude.

This is a marvelous portrayal of true friendship at the same time depicting some wild and stirring scenes of the early American pioneers and the war between the Federal and the Confederate states. There is a volume and depth to the acting of this picture that keeps one on the keen edge interest from the start of the first to the finish of the last scene that holds us throughout.

Such instances of gratitude and acts of bravery which are nothing short of self sacrifice are rarities that to many of us look like fiction yet we know are simple plain truths which are stronger that literary inventive genius and appeal to us as a strong uplift to the attainment of sincerity, gratitude and friendship.

NEW $30,000 THEATRE FOR LOUISVILLE.

Building Inspector Col. R. J. Tilford, of Louisville, Ky., has receved plans from the West Broadway Theatre Company, of that city, to erect a new photoplay theatre at the corner of Eighteenth street and Broadway, which will cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $30,000.

According to the specifications, the building will be modeled after the most up-to-date photoplay theatres in the east. It will be absolutely fireproof in construction and will contain all the safety appliances adopted by New York and Chicago theatres. The interior of the house will be most artistically decorated, while the front will be a blaze of electric lights.

If possible, the managers will obtain all first run reels and thereby try to give the patrons the best and latest there is in the motion picture field. The house will measure 60 by 210 feet.

PYTHIAN HALL A BIG SUCCESS.

The new photoplay theatre, which opened in the Pythian Castle, at Norfolk, Va., last week, is doing a great business. The Ford Brothers, who manage the house, have fitted it up in the most modern manner and now it is the most popular house in that city. There will be an entire change of pictures daily and many of the reels will be first run subjects. The proposition is an extensive one and should be patronized by the people of Portsmouth, Berkley and South Norfolk.

MR. BRADT RETURNS HOME

Popular Assistant Manager at Lincoln Square Photoplay Theatre Goes Back to San Francisco.

Mr. Joseph Bradt, assistant manager of the Lincoln Square photoplay theatre, New York City, has resigned his position and returned to his old home in San Francisco, Cal. During the ten months Mr. Bradt was Mr. Ferguson's assistant, he made many friends among the patrons of that popular house, who will greatly regret his going away.

Mr. Bradt was a typical Westerner, and his free, open and frank manner was what won him such commanding respect of the Lincoln Square audiences. There was no favor too great or small on the part of a patron that did not receive his prompt attention, in a manner that was always courteous, and obliging. It can be also stated, that besides being popular with both his employers and the patrons of the house, that the same amount of popularity existed with all those under him. On returning to San Francisco Mr. Bradt will resume his old position in one of the departments of the city.

L. Geisenberg, the head usher, will take Mr. Bradt's place. Mr. Geisenberg is well known at that house and is one of the most popular and well-known young men in any of Mr. Loew's photoplay theatres.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

All the members of the Vitagraph Stock Company have returned from the Pocono Mountains, where they have been to secure the necessary coloring for the Indian dramas which they have in process of construction. This is just like the Vitagraph: if the mountains won't come to the Vitagraph, the Vitagraph will go to the mountains. This will be the real thing—real Indians, real cowboys, real mountains and real actors, with some acts of real heroism and wild Western horsemanship. These productions, like all "Life Portrayals," are not just the same as others, they have an individuality. The American soldiers of the military barracks of the plains are there under the leadership of the great Indian fighters and heroes of American progress and advancement.

Mr. Maurice Costello made a quick trip to his native city, Pittsburg, Pa., to visit his mother, whom he had not seen for three years. His reception at his old homestead, he says, reminded him of motion pictures in which he has often portrayed the long absent son or the return of the prodigal.

Hallowe'en gives everybody a chance to look into the future and learn all about their sweethearts and beaux. There are three pleasing surprises in store for your immediate future. The first will occur on Tuesday, Oct. 25, "Jean Goes Foraging;" the second will appear on Friday, Oct. 28, "Captain Barnacle's Chaperone," and the third on Saturday, Oct. 29, "The Telephone," with an additional run entitled "A Day on a French Battleship." All of them—sweethearts, beaux, husbands and wives—will find these suitable for the last week of October.

We have noticed, in addition to the already striking faces in the Vitagraph Stock, several new and pretty faces, and we are told the company contains a real English baronet, who will exhibit his expert skill in horseback riding and expert lariat throwing as practiced in Australia and the wild West of America.

Fraulein Von Rottenthal recently returned from her Parisian conquests, and has been especially engaged to dance in one of the Vitagraph flower pictures in which a sylph-like dryad performs a vaporous dance of exquisite delicacy.

NEWSBOYS ENTERTAINED AT PHOTOPLAY THEATRE.

Fifty newsboys of Long Branch, N. J., were entertained at the Lyceum Photoplay Theatre, last Saturday night. The boys were the guest of the Long Branch Record, who did the thing up in a manner that caused the "Newsies" to think he is the best friend they have. The editor of the Record claims to have the best lot of young salesmen along the Atlantic coast, and for that reason he had the management of the Lyseum to put on an extra strong bill in order that the boys should have a good time.

THE VAMPIRE

A picture dramatization from Sir Ed Burne-Jones' famous painting, with suggestions from that world famous poem by Rudyard Kipling—each conceded a peer in the world of literature and art. This great subject handles deftly the realms of the imaginary inner circle of society.

A fool there was and he made his prayer—
(Even as you and I)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair—
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool called her his lady fair—
(Even as you and I).

Guy Temple, as "the fool there was," marries his brother's ward, his boyhood sweetheart, Emily. The young husband becomes ensnared in the toils of the Vampire (a destroyer of souls). Clandestine meetings are arranged and in the cunning unscrupulous satanic actions of the Vampire compels the poor weakling Temple to falter and fall before her charms.

John Temple, the older brother, determines to save the young husband when he discovers his perfidy and to recover the jewels given the Vampire by Guy. In a dream he remembers where he had seen Loie before. She it was, who had ruined the life of Emily's father and rendered the then slip of a girl an orphan. Seeking out the brother, John Temple told him Loie was a Vampire, that she had ruined his own wife's father and to quit her under threat of his life. He offers Loie a large sum of money to leave America. But her promise is soon forgotten—her direful work continues, the tightening strands on wreaking souls of mortals.

The fool was stripped to his foolish hide—
(Even as you and I).
Which she might have seen when she threw him aside—
But it isn't on record the lady tried
So some of him lived but the most of him died—
(Even as you and I).

The young husband's mind is rent—his honor gone and the yawning abyss of the great beyond seeks its own.

A picture with a high conception of the great lesson taught by the master work of this great artist and finished with a correctly posed reproduction of the painting completing one of the most sensational films ever released and destined to be a feature subject on every program.

MANAGERS WILL OPERATE OWN PLANT

Springfield Electric Co., Can't Get Picture Men to Remove Their Plants.

Before the Springfield Light, Heat and Power Co., of Springfield, O., can control all the electric lighting in that city, it will have to charge less than 3 cents per kilowatt to all the picture men and theatrical managers. At present the corporation has big ideas of getting control of all the lighting in that section of Ohio with the object of suppressing all smaller enterprises and then raising the rates to suit themselves.

At present, the one big obstacle in the road of the corporation, is the private plants, owned by the managers of picture and other theatres. These private plants have been made to pay, and managers have found out by experience, that they can save money and count on getting a better light than the Springfield Co. can supply. In fact the current is more steady and the voltmeter barely vibrates.

To prove that the private plants are better, one manager had the company put in its current. One night, after using the current from his own plant, he switched the company's current on and the difference in the steadiness in the picture was seen immediately. This was not only noticed by the operator of the machine and the manager, but the audience wanted to know what was the matter with the picture. It was here seen that the private plants had it "on the company."

Regarding the cost of keeping up the private plants and what the company would ask for light has been discussed among the managers; after a thorough investigation it is found that most managers, owning their own plants, could produce current as low as two cents per kilowatt and the most expensive plant cost but one-half a cent more per kilowatt. So it looks as if the corporation will have to offer much better inducements to get the theatrical managers to change their minds for the sake of tnat greedy enterprise.

It is claimed by the corporation that it is its purpose of enlarging the plant and putting in all new machinery, that will furnish a better light than what private plants can, but so far the managers have come to the conclusion that they can save money and satisfy the public much better than the Springfield Light, Heat & Power Co., even though it would reduce its rates to one cent per kilowatt.

NEW HOUSE FOR LINCOLN, ILL.

Edward Smith, one of the most popular young men in Lincoln, Ill., is now preparing to open up a first-class photoplay theatre in the O. M. Small building.

Mr. Smith is a practical photoplay man and will no doubt equip his theatre in a most modern manner. Before opening the house there will have to be many repairs made, such as decorating, painting and the installing of a fireproof booth and a new machine. Only the most recent pictures will be run.

"UNDER THE STARS AND BARS."—A soldier is always subject to his country's call, therefore it is with a quick response that the young officer of the Confederate army, fighting under the Stars and Bars, answers the call of duty and tells his wife that he must join his regiment and meet the enemy. Bidding his weeping young wife and child a hasty good-bye, we next see him with the cavalry en route to the military camp.

His superior officers trust him with an important message and he immediately starts on his way to deliver the document. Passing over many perilous obstacles through a wide stretch of country, he reaches the outposts of the Union forces, where he is captured and made a prisoner of war.

Under close guard he tries to send word to his wife, but can get no one to take the letter to her. The poor wife knows nothing of his fate, and it is not long before the Federal troops are attacking old Vicksburg, the bombs and shells crash into the houses and she is driven from home.

When the war is over in 1865, the husband, who has lost an arm and is suffering from fever, returns to his home to find it deserted. Unable to learn the whereabouts of his family, he goes to the hospital, where he is ill, and constantly grieves after his wife and child.

Convalescent, he is wheeled about the city park by an attendant in an invalid's chair. His wife and daughter, now a good-sized girl, are in the park. A peddler of fruit passes by and the little girl buys some oranges from him; at the same time she sees the sick soldier, for whom she feels very sorry; gives him one of her oranges, and he kisses her in return. The little girl tells her mother about the incident and insists upon her mother going to see the sick man.

To humor the child she goes with her and soon discovers that the man is her own husband and father of their child. This happy reunion of the three loving hearts presents a picture that impresses itself deeply on one's mind and we cannot resist the rising sob and the sympathetic tear.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

"THE FIRST GRAY HAIR."—A young fellow goes during his vacation to visit with relatives. Two of these, his cousin and his niece, are in love with him. He, being rather a flirt, is flattered by the attentions of both, although his heart tells him that the younger is in possession of his affections. One evening while sitting with his cousin, he proposes, but is refused, for she, with a woman's insight into these matters, knows he is only fascinated for the time being. She sends him away to find her niece, and the following day she sees that her premonition was correct, for the man has proposed marriage to the younger girl and been accepted. Then the elder when retiring for the night, finds a gray hair, the first of the many she knows will follow.

"THE AMAZON."—Amazons, or fighting women, passed into legend many years ago. In fact, some centuries have passed since the last was lost from history, but the name has come down to us as symbolic of all that is perfectly manly in a woman.

The Amazon of our film, socially, has climbed no higher than the position of servant, but physically has achieved wonderful results. Her muscular development is so great that it interferes with her every duty. All her tasks are overdone, much to the amusement of the auditors.

Her excess vitality applied to the work of one day succeeds in ruining most of the furniture and part of the dwelling she is paid to improve.

"THE LIFE OF MOLIERE."—Moliere—whose name is the greatest in the literature of France and who, in the literature of the modern drama, is the greatest after Shakespeare—has been brought to life again. The great actor-playwright, who excelled in comedy, and who was far ahead of his time in tragic declamation; the genius who decried and villified by competitors whose eyes were blinded by jealousy to his real greatness; the husband who suffered tortures in his domestic life, through the unfaithfulness of the wife whom he loved to distraction; the one-time strolling player who put rural France into spasms or laughter, and the polished comedian who contributed still greater distinction to the splendors of the most illustrious court that the world has ever known:—Moliere has been resurrected from his unknown grave and forced to play again his part on life's stage, before our very eyes, by the mystic power of the motion picture.

In viewing the scenes of this "Life of Moliere" one cannot fail to be impressed by the cameo clearness of the photography. And the artistic sense is always at fever point as the magnificently splendid scenes of court pageantry are lived over again.

We first see Moliere at work in his father's shop when a boy. All the employes are busy at their appointed tasks except the youthful playwright, who snatches time to re-read one of his earliest efforts. The door opens and the Italian comedian, Scaramouche, enters in quest of a particular style of chair. Moliere tenders his play for perusal; but just as Scaramouche begins to be interested Poquelin, the father of Moliere, comes in unexpectedly and the play is hastily thrown out of sight. Again the boy poet places it in the comedian's hand, and some clever work is done by Scaramouche as he tries to read the manuscript without being detected by the stern upholsterer.

The next scene shows Moliere at the Louvre Palace, where he meets Louis XIV. for the first time. Here we see the scorn of the courtiers for the actor-dramatist and the consideration shown for him by the King. This scene will be remembered for the delicate beauty of the interiors shown.

FOR THIRTEEN YEARS THE LEADING MANUFACTURERS OF MOTION PICTURE MACHINES

Now we view the stately splendor of the festival at Versailles, where hundreds of courtiers, ladies in waiting and great nobles attend on Louis XIV. The beauty of the court costumes, which set the fashion for all the royal houses in Europe at that time, and the courtly air and demeanor of every individual in the royal pageant, have been faithfully reproduced. One cannot but marvel at the excellence of the training of this vast throng, every one of whom acts his or her part as if manor-born. We must take off our hats to this Gaumont producer.

As Moliere comes into the scene, the acting of the King, the courtiers and of the great actor himself is faultless. When the King places his arm around Moliere's shoulders and walks off with him, it is a delight to watch the faces of the surprised and jealous train followers. And when next we see Louis seated at table with Moliere serving him with his own hands, the cup of the courtiers is full.

The scene showing the distraction of Moliere over the desertion of his wife, is a pathetic picture and displays talented emotional acting. Then when she appears, before finally leaving him, and we watch the play of coquetry on her witching face and note her charm of manner and grace of deportment, we do not wonder at poor Moliere's abandonment to despair. The attempt of the faithful maid servant to arouse Moliere from his apathy and melancholia is a brilliant specimen of silent acting in both roles.

The last appearance of Moliere, and his first in the role of Malade, is a fine depiction of the stage of the tennis court theatre and of the French manner of acting a part in the 17th century. Then follows his sudden illness and death.

The closing scene of the "Life of Moliere" shows a statue of the dramatist at Versailles in bust form. By means of a dissolving scene, the bust is surrounded by a throng of notables, assembled at its dedication of the poet's memory. A beautiful girl approaches the statue and places a laurel wreath on the chiseled brow; then, as if by magic, a similar wreath is seen in the uplifted right hand of everyone present—an imposing and fitting apotheosis of the greatest literary genius of France.

"THE SIGNET RING, OR THE INTRIGUE AGAINST THE PRINCESS."—Prince Walter, having heard of the beauty of Princess Bertha, sends an envoy to ask her hand of her father. The proposal is accepted and the envoy gives to Princess Bertha an engagement ring.

The chief advisor of Bertha's father, who wishes a brilliant marriage for his own daughter, Rosamund, plots to substitute her for the princess.

The Princess Bertha leaves her father's castle, en route for her new residence, accompanied by the advisor, Wilfrid.

When they are a long way on their journey, Wilfrid abandons the Princess in the wood and substitutes his daughter Rosamund. He takes her on to Prince Walter, who greets her as his fiancee.

Meanwhile, Princess Bertha has been given a home by woodmen and has caused them to marvel at her skill in weaving silken cloth. Bertha now embroiders beautifully a shawl which the wife of the woodcutter offers for sale at the castle. Prince Walter demands an audience with the person who embroidered the shawl and, led by the woodcutter, is soon in the presence of Princess Bertha, who still wears at her finger the wedding ring offered by the Prince. Wilfrid's plot is then discovered and while he and his daughter are imprisoned Prince Walter solemnly recognizes Princess Bertha as his wife.

"IN THE SPREEWALD."—In this picture we visit a very pleasant part of Prussia, traveling along a pretty stream and through delightful woodland, broken now and then by villages in which comely women, picturesquely dressed, are engaged in their avocations.

"HIS BREACH OF DISCIPLINE."—The story of a French lieutenant who resents an insult to the beautiful Mlle. Helene, of whom he is enamored, and to whom he is affianced, given by Capt. Miquelin, his superior officer. A challenge and a short fight in a dark alley—result, Lieut. Boin leaves his captain apparently mortally wounded, rushes to tell his sweetheart what he has done and on her advice flees from France. The next morning we see the detectives busy endeavoring to find the one who has assaulted the captain. The clues lead them to seek for Lieut.

Boin, who has disappeared. Mlle. Helene is questioned in her boudoir, but is so clever in acting an enforced role that she throws the detectives off the track.

Boin has proceeded to America, to the far West, and is mining in California, when we see him receive a letter from the beautiful Helene (in answer to one which he has written) agreeing to go to California and become his wife.

Time goes on and Gen. Lefarge, who has command of the division in which Lieut. Boin was an officer, calls to him the trusty captains three: Dunois, Villalon and LePard. News has been received that Boin is in California, and that, while Capt. Miquelin has recovered, discipline requires that Boin be apprehended and be brought back to France. This task is assigned by Gen. Lafarge to Dunois and his two comrades. They proceed on their journey, arrive at California and at the home of Boin (a rough log cabin), to which they are brought by the burly sheriff of Eldorado County, where they are met, much to their surprise, by none other than the lady they knew as Mlle. Helene, the rage of Paris. As they step into the room Boin reaches for a rifle, but the sheriff is quick with his gun, tells him not to attempt anything of that sort, and the scene proceeds between the men. Boin introduces his wife and all bow graciously to the lady. He then tells them what he did and the cause of the encounter between himself and his captain, and proceeds to give himself up to the sheriff. The chivalrous Western spirit of the rugged officer makes him turn toward the Frenchmen (who have come to take Boin) with an air of questioning, and holding the warrant in his hand, he tells them that "if it were he, he would tear this thing up." Capt. Dunois is in a quandary. His sympathies, of course, are with Boin. He consults the other captains and they agree that the proper thing to do is to leave Boin and his wife where they found them.

Dunois starts to tear up the warrant, when Boin, the young lieutenant, stops him and refuses to permit the captain to make such a sacrifice. The young officer and his wife accompany the Captains Three to France, where the final scene is enacted.

Gen. Lafarge receives the captains and their captive, and at first is very stern, but he shows a letter which he has received from Capt. Miquelin, written on his deathbed, requesting that Lieut. Boin be exonerated, and stating that it was he, and he alone, who was to blame for the whole trouble. Boin is reinstated to his position in the army of France and a pretty ending to the picture and story result.

The film is a splendid one in every way. Scenically and dramatically it is well-nigh perfect, and there is a blend of Western and French romance which gives the picture a peculiar charm.

"THE SWISS GUIDE."—A story of the Canadian Alps. This latest picture by the Edison Company goes far to show with what great strides this company is making in the way of enterprise and advancement for the highest and best that can possibly be obtained in the field of motion pictures, for here we are shown the Canadian Alps in all their grandeur and beauty in a strong dramatic picture that is certain to please the eye and reach the emotions of all who see it.

Away up in the heart of the Canadian Rockies, at Lake Louise, Leggan, the beauty spot of North America, this motion picture plot is laid amidst the snow-capped peaks and eternal glaciers of that region, where nature has done her finest work for mankind to feast his eyes upon. The story deals with human love and passion, weakness and infidelity centered around a Swiss guide and his wife, who are located at Lake Louise, a summer resort, for the purpose of guiding tourists over the dangerous passes and deep crevases of the glaciers that lay at the foot of this God's Mirror, surrounded by huge mountains.

One of the guests of the Chalet Hotel is a young and beautiful girl. This rough mountain guide soon falls under the spell of her beauty, and she, all unknowingly, is playing havoc with his heart. He follows her around with all that dumb, mute admiration of his nature. His young wife learns of his infatuation, but remains silent like the heroine of one of Richard Le Gallienne's short stories. She, in her way, feels his soul is only sick, and time will bring him back

Captain Barnacle's Chaperone

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 28th

This Is a Refined Comedy with Extremely Good Characterization.—It Shows How a Bright Young Lover Outwitted His Girl's Father and the Chaperone Employed to Watch the Young Sweethearts.

OLD CAPTAIN BARNACLE has a motherless daughter who is in love with a sailor boy named Paul. The Captain, with his daughter, lives in a comfortable little cottage by the sea, which, needless to say, the Captain follows for a livelihood. Between his business and his daughter he is very much occupied and troubled. He loves his little girl and strenuously objects to Paul's attentions and the prospect of losing her. The problem arises: how can he prevent it? He tells his difficulty to an old friend, who suggests putting an advertisement in the newspaper for a chaperone, and he readily swallows the idea, hook, bait, and all.

A very severe, talkative, prim female of age and experience answers the "Ad," is duly established as charge of affairs and custodian of the Captain's daughter, and he goes to sea feeling "all is well." Ruth does not take kindly to this arrangement and interference with her love matters. She sends word to Paul about the chaperone and he hits a plan to outwit the Captain and his vigil.

Disguising himself as a peddler he comes to the cottage, interests the old "gal" in his goods, and while she is admiring them he makes love to Ruth. The chaperone is much pleased with the peddler, and when he presents her with a fancy handkerchief she gets a desperate crush on him.

"The peddler" calls a second time on an invite to take tea. Paul gets in some fine bits of love making with Ruth, and entirely captivates Mrs. McGillicuddy, the chaperone, with whom he makes an appointment to elope in order to get her out of the house and gives Ruth a chance to elope with him.

The Captain, while all this is going on, is in another port, where he receives a letter from the chaperone that his daughter is a model girl and the young lover has not put in an appearance since the Captain went away. Captain Barnacle is delighted.

We return to the cottage, where we see the gay Mrs. McGillicuddy, with heart a-flutter, preparing to meet "the peddler" packing her valise and leaving the house for the meeting place. In the next scene we see her sitting by the roadside waiting. The "peddler" drives along, tells her he is going to the village for a few necessaries and he will stop for her on his return.

Instead of going to the village Paul goes to the cottage for Ruth, takes her in the buggy and starts for the parsonage, passing the chaperone, who is still waiting by the roadside, he just stops long enough to remove his peddler's disguise, give her the laugh, whip up his horse and leave her in a paroxysm of rage at being so cruelly duped by the young couple whom she was engaged to watch.

Old Captain Barnacle reaches home to find a note saying: "Even a chaperone cannot keep two loving hearts apart. By the time you get this I shall be Paul's wife." The chaperone rushes into the cottage, falls into the Captain's arms, and tells him all about the elopement.

They both wilt while the happy young couple are seen driving away on their honeymoon.

THE TELEPHONE

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29

A Thrilling Story of the Rescue of a Mother and Her Child from a Fiery Death Through the Happy Expedient and Assistance of the Telephone. Length, 665 Feet.

HELLO! Mr. Graham has gone out to the club for the evening, leaving his wife and child at home. While he is away the family cat jumps on the table and knocks over a lamp which is lit. The flame sets fire to the house, the wife and child have retired for the night and they are not awakened until their rooms are in a blaze.

The wife is frantic with terror, finding all means of escape cut off. She is trying to quiet the fears of her little one when she suddenly thinks of the telephone, calls up the club where her husband is stopping, tells them of the danger and they telephone the fire department, who immediately line out in full force. The engines are rushing through the streets, followed by the fire chief, ambulance and the police reserves. The husband with his club friends, in full dress suits, make their way to the street and join the fire laddies in their mission of rescue.

The house is a fiery furnace, flame and smoke pouring from every window. The wife appears at one, waves and cries for assistance. Her husband is held back by strong arms from dashing madly into the burning building. The men at the hose are already at work. One brave fellow scales the ladder which has been raised to the window where the imperilled family are located, the mother passes her child to him and he carries it to safety; again ascending the ladder he plunges through the window and lifts the woman from the floor where she has fallen in a dead faint and carries her down the ladder and places her unharmed in the arms of her husband.

JEAN GOES FORAGING

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 25

A Story of a Summer's Vacation.—How Two Young People Tried to Live in the Open.—Their Adventures and Their Narrow Escape from Starvation Through the Intelligence and Love of Their Dog, Jean.

A YOUNG married couple, desirous of getting next to nature for a few days, outfit themselves with a camping kit and start to rough it in the fields and woods, depending upon their skill in fishing and hunting for their rations. In the beginning this appears to be quite a lark and lots of fun, but as time goes on and they "get up against it," the fish won't bite, the game is nowhere in sight, and their provisions run out. They are in a bad way for food. Their bones ache and they are pretty nearly all in.

Here is where they find their faithful dog, Jean, a friend in need. He starts out foraging and soon returns with a fine rabbit, which they cook and find very relishable. He brings them "eats" from all directions and keep them well supplied with the necessaries of life. Jean is always on the job, and the way he finds the stuff is a caution.

Even with Jean's assistance things get worse, and worse, until they give up their exploit in despair and disgust and make their way toward home, which they reach completely used up. They order a supply of groceries and things with which to regale themselves and recuperate their lost health and strength, making a declaration never again to wander from their own fireside.

The landscapes shown in this picture are variations of nature that delight the eye and give a general view of the wanderings of these two foolish young adventurers. The intelligence of the collie dog, Jean, displayed, and his wonderful acting make "Jean Goes Foraging" a very extraordinary and individual film.

again to his own. But the heart when once filled with love, cannot long remain silent. At least, while away up in the mountains alone with the girl, the guide reveals to her his infatuation. Shocked and stunned by his boldness, she awakens him from his dreams by a ringing blow on the cheek, and without further word leaves him to find her dangerous way back alone. While passing over a perilous path she slips and falls, spraining her ankle, which renders her helpless, but the guide's faithful dog finds her and carries the news of her plight back to the guide's wife. Here the nobility of the woman is shown, and without a moment's hesitation, forgetting self and all, she, led by the dog, finds her helpless rival and carries her safely back to her friends. The only reward she will accept is a pair of gloves, the gift of her husband to the girl. It is hardly needless to say that the guide, after his rude awakening, realizes the nobility of the woman by his side, and once again husband and wife are united.

"OH, YOU SKELETON."—Now, girls, if you turned suddenly around and found a nice gentlemanly skeleton seated comfortably beside you, would you scream or be too frightened to utter a sound? Now, Martha, the new maid of all antics employed in a medical college was content to juggle pans in the kitchen—but when brought face to face with the cold remnant of a past mortal, she lets out a noise that would fade the sound of the motion picture machine into insignificance, and rushes from the room, only to be confronted by another and another. Until Martha is a regular encyclopedia of all this is frightful. Composing herself long enough, she summons the officers, who are led to believe something bordering on a massacre has occurred, and hasten to the scene. The appearance of the skeleton cools their ardor and dampens the courage of the blue coats, and they join the merry stampede. Martha hits a street car for the tall and uncut, but our friend the skeleton bobs up again and a large hole in the car window marks the maid's hasty exit. Seeking refuge from her enemies, she lands in a room with no visible skeleton, but the news was too good to be true, and poor Martha finds it necessary to imitate Halley's comet, and on the window marks her course, landing on a steep roof, tumbles into the bathing tank below and is only rescued with difficulty. Poor Martha had a hard time and has never reconciled herself to the association of skeletons.

"GHOST OF THE OVEN."—Hilda was the bakery girl, with a sweetheart who was not altogether welcome on account of Hilda's employer, who objected to his visits. In order to secrete her lover from the baker, who was coming, she hides him in a cold oven, but forgets to hide the tin pail that the beer came in, and a mouse is scented and poor Hilda lost the job, and the boss baker hires Hans to take her place; also orders a fire built under the cold furnace. The boy helper, remonstrating, finally tells him there is a man hid in there. The boss at once sees the situation and goes for material for the fire. The sweetheart, overhearing this, makes his escape to the flour bin. The fire is built, but upon examination he finds the bird has flown. Determined not to be outdone, a few old bones are gotten from the cast off scraps and placed in the oven and Hilda sent for. The boss having had a good laugh at her expense, is just preparing to go fishing over Sunday, and accordingly locks the flour bin and repairs to the country to angle with the finney tribe. Upon his return Monday he finds the new baker on the job and prepares to fill up the bin. In a moment of their absence the lover escaped back to the oven, only to be compelled to confront his executioners, who are amazed and exit pellmell to the street. An excited chase ensues.

"BLASTED HOPES."—The gold crowned fields of yellow, teeming with sparkling autumn dew, furnishes a background for planning of life's young dream and with the too frequent result of blasted hopes. Sallie is a conventional country lass, yet in her teens—who was fond of her childhood sweetheart, Jasper—but one night, a hunting party, finding their auto short of gasoline, drew up to the little farm house and asked for accommodations until they could send to the city for gasoline. Jim, the spokesman for the party, being more friendly, as it was he who first met Sallie in the corn field and through her directions found the father and bargained with him to pull his machine to the farm house for the night. Sallie entertains her guests with the family organ, and all soon repair to their room except Jim, who had quietly arranged to meet Sallie outside, presumably to take a smoke before retiring.

They are seen strolling in the moonlight. A little band of gold is placed upon her finger and to the simple country girl a new life has opened up, and Jasper was no longer a serious consideration in her mind. On taking his departure the next morning, Jim presses firmly in her hand a note giving his city address and saying he would return and ask her father's consent for her hand. But Jim was an adept at making promises and equally so in breaking them, and was in two months' time married to his fiancee in the city, and poor Sallie was to him as a page torn from the calendar of remembrance. She runs away from the quiet little home to the big city and tries to find Jim. Finding his address, she is informed he is not in the city. She patiently awaits his return; her money is almost gone. Upon her return to the office, she finds him in and a smile lights up her troubled face, but only doomed to gloom, for she is confronted by his wife and faints from the shock.

Upon being revived she wends her way to the public park to seek a place in silence and alone. Jim, joy riding, is attracted and hastens to aid the suffering woman, when he discovers it is Sallie. Remorse is plainly visible in his face as the poor confiding girl is borne away. The scene carries us back to the little farm where ma and pa are sitting alone, waiting and praying for their little girl until restless slumber had closed their eyes. Completing a beautiful picture of the great emotions of human nature.

A very severe, talkative, prim female of age and experience answers the "ad," is duly established as charge of affairs and custodian of the captain's daughter, and he goes to sea feeling "all is well." Ruth does not take kindly to this arrangement and interference with her love matters. She sends words to Paul about the chaperone and he hits a plan to outwit the captain and his vigil.

Disguising himself as a peddler he comes to the cottage, interests the old "gal" in his goods, and while she is admiring them he makes love to Ruth. The chaperone is much pleased with the peddler, and when he presents her with a fancy handkerchief she gets a desperate crush on him, which he encourages.

The "peddler" calls a second time on an invite to take tea. Paul gets in some fine bits of lovemaking with Ruth, and entirely captivates Mrs. McGillicuddy, the chaperone, with whom he makes an appointment to elope in order to get her out of the house, and gives Ruth a chance to elope with him.

The captain, while all this is going on, is in another port, where he receives a letter from the chaperone that his daughter is a model girl and the young lover has not put in an appearance since the captain went away. Captain Barnacle is delighted.

We return to the cottage, where we see the gay Mrs. McGuillicuddy, with heart a-flutter, preparing to meet the "peddler," packing her valise and leaving the house for the meeting place. In the next scene we see her sitting by the roadside waiting. The "peddler" drives along, tells her he is going to the village for a few necessaries and he will stop for her on his return.

Instead of going to the village Paul goes to the cottage for Ruth, takes her in the buggy and starts for the parsonage, passing the chaperone, who is still waiting by the roadside; he just stops long enough to remove his peddler's disguise, give her the laugh, whip up his horse and leave her in a paroxysm of rage at being so cruelly duped by the young couple whom she was engaged to watch.

Old Captain Barnacle reaches home to find a note from his daughter saying: "Even a chaperone cannot keep two loving hearts apart. By the time you get this I shall be Paul's wife." The chaperone rushes into the cottage, falls into the captain's arms, and tells him all about the elopement. They both wilt while the happy young couple are seen driving away on their honeymoon.

"THE TELEPHONE."—Hello! Mr. Graham has gone out to the club for the evening, leaving his wife and child at home. While he is away the family cat jumps on the table and knocks over a lamp which is lit. The flame sets fire to the house; the wife and child have retired for the night and they are not awakened until their rooms are in a blaze.

The wife is frantic with terror, finding all means of escape cut off. She is trying to quiet the fears of her little one when she suddenly thinks of the telephone, calls up the club where her husband is stopping, tells them of the danger and they telephone the fire department, who immediately line out full force. The engines are running through the streets, followed by the fire chief, ambulance and the police reserves. The husband with his club friends in full dress suits make their way to the street and join the fire laddies in their mission of rescue.

The house is a fiery furnace, flame and smoke pouring from every window. The wife appears at one, waves and cries for assistance. Her husband is held back by strong arms from dashing madly into the burning building. The men at the hose are already at work. One brave fellow scales the ladder which has been raised to the window where the imperiled family are located, the mother passes her child to him and he carries it to safety; again ascending the ladder he plunges through the window and lifts the woman from the floor where she has fallen in a dead faint and carries her down the ladder and places her unharmed in the arms of her husband.

"THE MESSAGE OF THE VIOLIN."—The ends of Cupid's plans are sometimes frustrated, but give him a secure hold on two affined hearts, there is no power strong enough to thwart him in his purpose. Separations, quarrels, and the like, may occur, but his ordaining is invincible. In an East Side neighborhood there lived two families, and while they were neighbors there did not exist any extent of communication between the members except by the two children, a son of one and a daughter of the other. They have become sweethearts from early childhood. The boy has grown up a very clever violinist, but his impoverished condition forbids his advancing very high in his art, his father being a confirmed drunkard, draining him of the meager earnings he secures playing at cheap entertainments and balls. The girl, however, is more fortunate, as her parents are highly moral and iudustrious. Ever hopeful, they become engaged. Sometime before the opening of the story, the girl's father comes into possession of an apparently worthless farm, and on the very day of the young people's betrothal, the father receives a telegram to the effect that oil has been struck on this land, making him immensely wealthy. This good fortune pleases the girl, for she thinks it will make the chance of her marriage with the young man more assured. The girl's father, however, knows something about the boy's family and mildly disapproves the match. Still, he is reasonable and visits the boy's home to see for himself. The sight that greets him widens the breach, for he finds the boy's father, an odious parasite, disgustingly intoxicated from drink procured from the boy's earnings. The girl's father appreciates the fact that the boy is not to blame, and writes that under existing circumstances marriage with his daughter is out of the question, but will give him a chance to improve his condition. The girl and her parents move into new quarters, and she is sent to college to fit herself for the change of station. Meanwhile, the boy's father has died and the boy by a stroke of good fortune meets a professor of music, who, realizing the young man is possessed of undeveloped talent, offers to assist him, securing for him engagements to play at many swell functions. During all this time the young lovers have lost track of each other, and she, not having heard from him, considers the proposal of a baron, whose attentions rather flatter her than actuate a feeling of love. This baron's attitude towards the girl is simply induced by her father's wealth, as is clearly shown in his treatment of a woman to whom he has been paying court. A reception is given at which the betrothal is to be announced, and for this reception the young man is engaged as one of the attractions. During the program he plays one of the old melodies he used to play for the girl. It is needless to say that the betrothal of the girl and the baron was not announced.

"THE PASSING OF A GROUCH."—That a grouch is contagious is a well established fact, for the man with the grouch contaminates those he comes in contact with. And strange to say, the original possessor of the grouch seems to lose it. Nelson leaves home for his office in the morning in the best of spirits. With him it is "Hail! Smiling morn!" On the way, however, he slips and falls, owing to a banana skin being thrown carelessly on the sidewalk, and so is born the grouch. Arriving at the office in a horrible humor, he transfers the grouch to his typist, who passes it on to the mail clerk. Next to get it is one of Nelson's clients. He in a rage enters a restaurant and passes it to a party at a neighboring table. This man passes it on to a small boy, who in turn lands it on the copper. Next the housemaid, the copper's sweetheart, gets it, each one losing their bad temper as the grouch passes on. But the grouch, like chickens, comes home to roost, and when Nelson arrives home he finds his wife possessed of it, the maid having been the agency.

"THE PROPOSAL."—"When a man marries his troubles begin." So run the lines of the old song, but this maxim did not impress Benj. Binns, when he began to realize his abject loneliness. He decides that he needs a wife, so he visits the widow Smith in hopes of winning her as his helpmate. To say that he is impressed by her is putting it mild, for he finds her a neat housekeeper, a good cook and apparently sweet tempered. In fact, he reasons that she is just the one to make him happy. He hasn't, however, the courage to propose marriage to her personally, so decides to write it. Going to the letter box, he has just dropped his tender missive into its dark recesses when he sees an illustration of what his lot may be—a married couple pass, the wife carrying a squawking baby, while the man is loaded down with bundles. Binns is aghast. "Me for that? Never!" But the letter is posted, and although he waits for the collector, his plea for its return is in vain. He waits outside the widow's house to intercept the delivery, but, alas, in vain. His endeavors to regain

"A DAY ON THE FRENCH BATTLESHIP JUSTICE."—This is a very interesting and extremely entertaining picture of how the "middies" and "jackies" of the French navy do things on ship board, giving an idea of their exercises, frolics and pastimes. It is so entirely different, novel and absorbing, as well as instructive. It is like taking a voyage on this great vessel and learning all about things that do not come under our observation once in a lifetime—not very often, anyway.

PATHE FRERES.

"ANOTHER'S GHOST."—Tony, a variety artist, by his clever impersonations, pleases the manager of a traveling circus, and is engaged as one of the troup. After the show is over that night, the old showman, with the proceeds of the day's performance in his pockets, sets off in search of fresh talent. Overtaken by a severe storm, he takes refuge at a lonely country inn. Getting a glimpse at the contents of his wallet, the innkeeper's cupidity is aroused. His wife surreptitiously removes the wallet. The old man discovers his loss, and, in the act of accusing the guilty couple, falls dead. The innkeeper has secretly dropped a deadly poison into his glass of wine. The innkeeper afterward hides the bag in a secret cupboard, and informs the authorities of the old showman's death. His identity is discovered, and news of his death is sent to the circus. Tony arrives, and questions the innkeeper as to the wallet, but he denies all knowledge of it. Tony's suspicions are aroused, and an idea occurs to him. The innkeeper is haunted by a vision of the showman. Suddenly the door opens, and the guilty pair are confronted by a spectre of the dead man. They are made to confess their guilt, and Tony then throws off his disguise and hands the guilty pair over to the police.

"MOTOR FIEND."—Here is a film that will be appreciated by both classes—those who own automobiles and those who do not. They will all laugh and scream when they see it. The plot is so new, so fresh, so untouched, and the idea of it is so comic, that it is almost a mistake to even hint at the absurdly funny scenes the picture depicts. There is, however, one thing it seems right to tell—the story is the dream of a motor fiend. He dreams that his auto is fitted with a "joy meter," and that all speed limits have been eliminated. What is a "joy meter" you all want to know, and we suppose we must tell you this so that you can have an idea of what the picture is about. A "joy meter" consists of various dials or indicators arranged on an attachment that fits to the front of any motor, and that indicates the number of men, women, policemen, dogs, hens, or mothers-in-law that you may happen to run over. It is most accurate in its work, but in order to understand it properly you must see the film, which gives a most vivid and graphic idea of its operation.

"BUFFALO FIGHT."—This is a characteristic picture taken in one of the islands of Oceania, which includes besides the actual representation of the fight itself, a number of views of the preparations for the combat, and of the field of spectators. After the business of choosing the combatants has been satisfactorily concluded, the horns of a couple of the buffaloes are sharpened, and they are led into the field. The two buffaloes, finding themselves face to face, engage in a struggle which the excited crowd watches with vivid interest until the finish. The field is not kept clear, and the spectators are allowed to cross it in all directions, so that the sight of the two fighting buffaloes and the people persistently wandering from one side of the stretch of grass to the other is at times rather curious.

"BRUGES, BELGIUM."—Quaint old Bruges is one of the Dead Cities of Belgium, and after the canals the mediaeval aspect of the town is its most striking feature. Interesting specimens of Flemish architecture of the Middle Ages are to be met with at every turn. The canals, which both surround and intersect the town, are always picturesque and interesting, and often very beautiful. The Minnewater or Lac d'Armour, a beautiful sheet of water, upon whose scarcely rippled surface the reflection of the bridge which spans it is always clearly outlined, is well known to tourists, as also is the Belfry with its famous chimes. Other objects of interest are the Beguinage bridge, the Hotel de Ville or Townhall, the old King's Palace, and the Maison du France. A picture of one of the weekly markets held in the "HAGENBECK'S MENAGERIE."—A few of the most important sections of this world-famed collection of animals is given. The animals are mostly lodged in quarters cunningly contrived to look like their native haunts.

"MAX IN THE ALPS."—Max has fallen in love with a pretty widow staying in the Alpine district. The widow is not at all certain that her light-hearted adorer will not soon turn to other loves. She proposes, therefore, as a test of his devotion, that he shall gather her a sprig of edelweiss, that rare flower that is only to be found on the tops of the mountains. Max starts out to execute his mission, and with his immaculate silk hat, light cane and accurately creased trousers commences forthwith the ascent of an Alpine peak, evidently considering that the warmth of his passion will keep the cold out. He sights one of the blossoms through his telescope and heroically plunges through the snow, prodding his way with his stick and stumbling, slipping and falling. Now he will disappear almost entirely beneath a mass of snow, with the top of his hat only to be seen; the next minute he has emerged and is struggling upwards. It is a hopeless task to attempt to describe the whole of the climb, which is rich in humor of the right sort. We will pass over the various incidents until the time when Max, having measurably decreased the distance between him and the longed-for flower, makes a false step and falls down the mountain. Luckily he is unhurt, but his spirits and his silk hat are both crushed. He screws his eye to the glass, takes a peep at the far away flower which seems to mock at his misery, and decides to relinquish the task. He accordingly picks himself up and makes his way towards his hotel. On the way he meets an edelweiss seller, and in an instant makes up his mind what to do. He purchases a blossom, and bearing it away with great care, lays it in triumph at the feet of his enchantress.

"THE INDIAN AND THE MAID."—Ruth and Jack are in their teens and are sweethearts. Ruth having been invited out to her uncle's ranch to live, starts out, and is met by him at the little railroad depot. As they leave the station her uncle almost knocks over an Indian, Swiftfoot by name, whom Ruth prevents from injuring him. Swiftfoot is struck with admiration for Ruth, and noticing that she has dropped her glove gallops after the wagon, and hands it to her. Two weeks later Ruth goes out riding through the rough Western country, and getting off her pony to admire the scenery, slips over a fifty-foot precipice into the boiling torrent below. Swiftfoot, coming by, sees the pony and quickly perceives Ruth's plight. Taking a rope from his saddle, he lowers himself from an overhanging rock and catches her as she sweeps along. With difficulty he climbs up the cliff with Ruth on his shoulder, and throwing her across his horse takes her back to the ranch, where under proper treatment she soon recovers.

As a token of gratitude her uncle decides to have Swiftfoot educated, and before he leaves the ranch Ruth gives him a rose, which he places in his pocket and treasures. Four years later Ruth, who has returned East, invites Jack to come and see her, and tells him to bring along that roommate of his that he has written is such a good fellow. What is her surprise to find that it is Swiftfoot who is at college with Jack. She tells Jack the story of the accident. While doing so, Swiftfoot sees through the mirror in an adjoining room the two sweethearts kiss, and sees that he has no chance to win Ruth's love, so decides to return to his people. His tribe, however, refuses to welcome one of their number who has become civilized, and he wanders off to the spot where he rescued Ruth. He pulls out the dried rose, and looking at it he sees a picture of Ruth struggling in the torrent for her life. Without hesitation he dives from the precipice deep into the roaring rapids, never to appear again.

George is indifferent and his wife sensitive, and when the young husband realizes their strained relations he endeavors to revive the old love. However, his overtures of peace and his evident willingness to "make up" are not accepted, and with a sigh he takes his hat and leaves the house.

In the park he seats himself dejectedly on a bench, endeavoring to think of some plan through which he can win back his wife's love. Brooding over his troubles, he does not notice the approach of two ladies, apparently mother and daughter, who sit down on the bench beside him. Through a slight accident, when the girl drops her book and Harris returns it, he starts a conversation, and the meeting ends with the young lady and he exchanging cards.

Harris sets out to walk to his office, recalling pleasantly the happy meeting and wishing his wife was as sweet natured as the little lady he had just left. A desire to see the young girl again takes possession of him, but he resists the temptation to return to the park, and compromises with a resolve to send her a box of flowers.

At the florist's store he orders a great boquet of roses, and attached to the box a card bearing the name and address of the young lady. A messenger boy is hurried off to the address given and Harris goes on to his office.

On the way the boy meets a few other young street Arabs and joins them in a game of "craps," but they are interrupted by a policeman, and in the hurried getaway the boy loses the card.

He returns to the florist's, but neither of them can recollect the name and address, when the florist seems to recall that the flowers were for Mrs. Harris.

The petulant wife is surprised when she opens the flowers and finds they are from her husband, and at the end of the long day, when her husband has returned, she has made up her mind to give him more of her love.

He finds her smiling and pleased and upon her explanation about the flowers, which, to him, is at first a mystery, opens his arms and takes her to his heart.

"HANK AND LANK."—Hank and Lank have had some unusually strenuous experiences since we saw them last, and wandering lazily about town they stop in front of a furniture store, in front of which is displayed two large commodious Morris chairs, which look particularly inviting to the two tired hobos.

With the air of prospective buyers they stop to casually examine the chairs, and upon looking about to make sure the proprietor is not in sight, Lank throws his tired form back into the cushions and shortly Hank follows his example. Presently both drop off to pleasant dreams.

In the meantime a policeman and a nurse maid with a go-cart pass by and stop a little way down the street for a moment's flirtation. As they talk two boys, bent on mischief, come on the scene, see Hank and Lank asleep and the copper busy at lovemaking. One of them suggests they have some fun with the hobos and incidentally "get even" with the neighborhood terror, the police officer.

A handy awning rope is slipped from a hook on the furniture store, a loop made and slipped over Lank's lank calf, while the other end is deftly tied to the leg of the policeman. One of the boys then awakens Lank, excites his anger, and Lank indignantly rises to give chase. With his long legs, Lank would have easily overtaken the youngsters were it not for the rope and 250 pounds of the law attached to the other end. Lank falls sprawling, and so does the policeman.

The following scenes are extremely funny. Lank, encouraged by his little partner, drags the policeman across two lots and dashing into a barnyard closes the gates, unties the rope on his own leg and securely ties the officer to the fence. Hank and Lank then make a hasty getaway while the poor copper is left to his own resources in extricating himself.

"THE SILENT MESSAGE."—Jeff Sanders, outlaw, has been captured by the sheriff, who is taking him by rail to the nearest lock-up. Jeff is desperate and when the train slows down to a curve he makes a leap through the window, and, despite his handcuffs escapes serious injury. Before the sheriff can leave the train and pursue him Jeff has taken refuge in the gulches of the rough country and the officer's only hope of recapture is to notify the sheriff of the next county, who makes a fruitless attempt to get the outlaw.

Up in the hills, Jeff breaks the handcuffs over a stone, and so is free, but hungry and unarmed. His opportunity of securing a weapon comes when he sees

Cal Evans, a cowpuncher, dismount to tighten a cinch. Stealing up behind the unsuspecting cowpuncher, Jeff jerks the revolver from the man's belt, and at the point of a gun forces him to give up his horse. He is now mounted and armed and is sure he will be able to get good start before the cowboy can give the alarm.

Soon he comes to the lonely ranch house of the Lazy K outfit, where Gladys, the ranchman's daughter, is alone except for Prairie Flower, a deaf and dumb Indian girl. Gladys has taught the squaw the white man's finger talk, and the girl repays her benefactor with a strong devotion peculiar to her race. We see Gladys despatch the squaw on an errand to the spring, instructing her in the sign language, and the squaw takes the bucket and goes out.

Scarcely has she gone when Jeff enters the house, and threatening Gladys with the revolver, orders her to prepare a meal for him. She has no fear of him so long as she complies with his demand and sets food before Jeff, who eats ravenously. His appetite satisfied, the ungrateful outlaw makes advances to Gladys, who now realizes that she is in a dangerous position.

However, she is a resourceful girl and in seeking for some way out of her predicament she remembers Prairie Flower. Concealing her resentment of Jeff's love-making, she so maneuvers as to place herself between him and the window, and glancing out sees the Indian girl returning from the spring.

She gives no sign of this to Jeff, who is unaware there is another human being within miles of the ranch house. Carrying out her pretense of a flirtation with the outlaw, she seats herself coquettishly on the window sill, and while talking and joking with him she slips one hand out of the window and attracts the attention of the squaw. In sign talk she tells the girl of her plight, and that she will hold the man there until the Indian girl can bring the boys or the sheriff to effect the capture. The Indian girl obeys the silent order and after a wild ride finds and notifies the sheroff, who gathers a posse and follows her back to the ranch house.

Here matters are reaching a crisis. The girl's mild responses to Jeff's attentions no longer satisfy him and in desperation she makes an attempt to get the revolver from him. She tries to escape into the open but he blocks the door, and then believing her entirely cornered and at his mercy, he again attempts to take her in his arms.

But in his pursuit of the girl he has grown careless and does not hear the approaching horses outside. The door is flung open, and before the surprised outlaw can make a move in his defense, he is in the hands of the posse, whom the deaf squaw has brought to the rescue of her mistress.

"ROMANCE IN THE ROCKIES."—Dick Sterling, a young miner, defends Red Fox, an Indian, from the wantom attack of a trio of Mexicans and wins Red Fox's gratitude. The Mexicans, Juan Mendoza in particular, swear to get even, and opportunity for revenge with reward comes when they learn that Sallie Barton, Dick's sweetheart, has located a placer mine. Dick is working the claim for her and they plan to rob him. Sallie has seen them coming through the woods and climbs into a tree to evade them. They halt under the tree to complete their plot and she everhears their scheme and hurries to warn Dick. In her haste she slips on the rocks and hurts her ankle. Her pistol shots are heard by Red Fox, who takes her in his canoe to the camp, where the cowboys are warned and set out in pursuit of the trio of desperadoes, who have stolen horses on which to make their getaway. Meantime Red Fox hurries back to the mine and traces the trail of the greasers to the tree to which they have bound Dick, and with Dick on the Indian pony they head for camp, reaching there as the boys return after having captured the three offenders. At first a lynching was intended and the ropes are already about the necks of the horse thieves, when the minister interferes and induces them to turn the captives over to the sheriff. He rides back to camp with them and his presence suggests the marriage of Dick and Sallie as a fitting termination to the day's adventure.

"FALSE LOVE AND TRUE."—Disgusted by the very evident attempts to win her fortune rather than her heart, the heiress decides to go in search of true love and finds employment in a store, while she rooms in a cheap boarding house. The boarder in the next room is a manly young mechanic, very different from the fashionable idlers and fortune hunters she has encountered, and a treat of ice cream after the day's work means more than did the opera in the olden days. The little heiress finds not only happiness but love, though her sweetheart is slow in making his declaration. Things come to a head when the heiress is warned that one of her most persistent suitors has discovered her address and he tries to force his attentions upon her. He gets very demonstrative when the young mechanic answers the call for help and throws the schemer out in no gentle manner. Then he makes his own declaration of love and is accepted. They are wed in the boarding house parlor where love had its birth, and the groom has no idea of his bride's wealth until she leads him into her handsome home and explains her deception. He is taken aback, but, after all, love is what counts, and the discreet servants who blunder upon a tender passage arrive at the same decision.

"EDITH'S AVOIRDUPOIS."—Edith was fat and was getting fatter all the time. Then she ran across a book on physical culture that hinted that fat was fatal to love. Edith wanted to hold her husband's love, so she started training, but said nothing to her husband about it. It was bad enough when she lunched off excelsior and dined on baled hay, but when she donned sweater and short skirt and started to do some road work the real trouble commenced. Almost as bad were the facial gymnastics prescribed by the book to eliminate wrinkles. When Edith's husband saw those horrible grimaces he was certain that she had gone insane, and the doctor inclined to the same opinion. It looked very much as though it would be a nice, quiet, padded cell for Edith, but in the end she produced the book and explained that it was to hold her husband's love. Then hubby told her that he loved her best when she was her own fat self and not an imitation of a jack-in-the-box, so Edith threw the book away and decided that there were worse things than too much flesh. The sprightly story is well handled in the Lubin fashion, with never a dull moment in its entire length, and forms a splendid reel companion to "False Love and True." It will particularly appeal to those threatened with stoutness, but the real humor of the story will please all.

A POWERFUL DRAMA OF STIRRING HEART INTEREST

KALEM CO.

"THE STRONGEST TIE."—Catering to the pronounced demand throughout the country for "Western dramas," the Kalem Company offer a new production called "The Strongest Tie," which is one of the best things yet turned out by the capable actors of the Kalem Stock Company. The incident is centered in a lumber camp, where two typical young lumbermen are working, and incidentally are suitors for the hand of the same girl. One of them wins and is betrothed to the girl, but a turn of fortune takes him to another job in a distant lumber camp, where he meets with an accident which destroys his memory. The girl waits for him faithfully until she is convinced that he is dead, and then marries the other suitor. Several years later the first man suddenly recovers his memory, comes back to claim the girl. She in the meantime has settled down to domestic life and has a little girl four or five years of age, but the return of the man to whom she was betrothed in former years, naturally revives her love for him and after a great struggle with herself she finally resolves to run away from her husband. The climax of the story takes place when her husband acknowledges the rights of the former lover and gives up the wife. As she is about to leave, the little child toddles in and the theme of the play at once becomes apparent, namely, that mother love is "The Strongest Tie" after all.

"INDIAN PETE'S GRATITUDE."—This is the title of the Kalem weekly Indian picture and the date of its issue is Friday, Oct. 28. The story portrays a phase of Indian character which is well recognized by all historians of the Indian type. A half-breed Indian is befriended by a settler, and in addition is given a job in the settler's family, where he becomes the devoted servant of the settler's daughter. As the story progresses the girl's father becomes interested in some recently discovered mining claims and decides to buy one which has not yet been registered. Some claim jumpers, who by chance learned of the deal, started to get possession of the claim by getting to the registry office first, and in order to accomplish this one of them holds up the girl's father while the other rides to town to make the entry. The half-breed gets wind of the conspiracy and is able to warn the girl, who mounts her favorite pony and races with the claim jumpers to the registry office. She is enabled to win out through the pluck of the half-breed, who holds up the claim jumpers until she gets a good lead, but in his efforts to help the girl the young half-breed is mortally wounded and thus gives up his life for his white friends.

The story is admirably enacted and is true to the atmosphere of the West. It is particularly notable for the splendid exhibition of horsemanship in the race for the registry office.

DETERMINING A CARBON.

Mr. R. F. Pierce of the Chas. L. Kiewert Co. Explains How to Pick a Carbon.

We are receiving many favorable comments from operators upon the "Bio" Carbon. This concern has spent considerable time studying the conditions of the motion picture business in America and has come to the conclusion that the wide range of arc voltages prevailing on numerous machines necessitates the furnishing of two distinct grades of carbons in order to produce the best results.

It is a well known fact among all electrical engineers that the composition of electric arc carbons is very largely determined by the arc voltage at which they are required to operate. The arc voltage recommended by the leading American and foreign manufacturers of motion picture machine arc lamps is from 45 to 60 volts. Carbons designed for this voltage will operate satisfactorily at as low as 45 volts. Below 45 volts, however, a much softer carbon is required. It is safe to say that at least nine-tenths of the troubles that occur in the use of alternating current motion picture arc lamps are due entirely to insufficient voltage at the arc. It is possible to use soft carbons with practical results over the entire range of voltage occurring in American practice, but the great advantages to be gained from the higher voltage carbons wherever the arc voltage is sufficient to operate them are so evident that they have appealed at once to the critical operator.

It has been found that over 90 per cent. of the current saving devices in the United States will deliver a sufficiently high voltage to operate the high voltage "Bio" Carbon. In order, however, to satisfy the demand of the customers who are unable to obtain a sufficient arc voltage for the regular "Bio" Carbon, the makers are furnishing a softer low voltage carbon, known as the "Bio-A," designed to operate from 35 volts upward. This is a great convenience in the case of exhibitors controlling a large number of theatres, most of which may be able to obtain sufficient arc voltage for high voltage carbon, but having a few demanding the use of the low voltage carbon. The furnishing of this well-known carbon in two grades to such exhibitors enable them to purchase but one make of carbon and to obtain the advantages of the new high voltage carbon wherever the conditions permit its use.

In deciding definitely upon designing the regular carbon for high voltage, the makers of the "Bio" Carbon consulted with the leading American manufacturers of motion picture machine arc lamps and found a very uniform sentiment in favor of the use of a higher arc voltage. A very wide investigation showed that a carbon, operating at its best between 45 and 60 volts at the arc, would meet the conditions of practically all exhibitors and they considered it preferable to make a special carbon to take care of these conditions where insufficient voltage prevailed, rather than to sacrifice the great advantages of the high voltage carbon for the sake of the few instances where it could not be successfully used. The selection of carbons for any particular purpose is very simple and the results obtained are worth many times over the amount of trouble involved. Operators who are anxious to produce the best possible results in their pictures are recommended to call upon a competent electrician to take volt meter and ammeter measurements across the arc and come with this information to the carbon makers, who will be glad to furnish carbons especially adapted to meet the conditions as they are found. This simple expedient will enable the operator to obtain better results than he had ever before considered possible and point the way to the elimination of many difficulties that have heretofore been impossible to correct.

It is safe to say that at least three-fourths of the operators in the United States have various difficulties in the operation of the arc to which they have become so accustomed that they really regard them as normal conditions impossible of correction. It is not generally understood that most of these difficulties can be made to disappear by the selection of proper carbons, and the only way to determine upon the proper carbon for each particular case is to obtain the actual instrument readings referred to above.

Gentlemen:-

You may be interested in knowing that I consider my success in this business due to the use of the Motiograph.

When I came to this town about two years ago, there were two other shows and for me it was a gloomy prospect, but the Motiograph pictures drew the crowd and have drawn them ever since. I now have one of the other shows and the third is out of business. I believe I would have gone broke if I had not used the Motiograph. I am now doing a good business which I believe is due to the excellent pictures projected by the Motiograph, to say nothing of its wearing qualities. I have Motiographs in both my houses.

Very truly yours,

The General Film Company's offices here circularized their customers on this series, and so also did the Geo. K. Spoor Co. exchange, with the result that a great demand is already assured.

While, at this writing, the exact date of these special releases is not definitely known, it has been decided that they will be released some day during the week commencing Monday, Oct. 31.

California Picture Theatres Praised.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur V. Smith and baby, accompanied by Miss Maud Heyl, of San Francisco, passed through this city early last week, on their return to New York, after a three weeks' stay in California, during which most of the cities and sights of Southern California were taken in.

Mr. Smith tells me that licensed business was very good in every city visited, and that the "independents" are on the run, and down hill at that. He states that he did not see one good "independent" theatre during the trip, these houses being confined to small store theatres. He informed me, too, that many of the old "independent" exchanges are not buying any new product, but that they are supplying their customers with junk.

Mr. Smith brings a glowing story of the character of licensed picture theatres in California, especially of the handsome structures and beautifully decorated interiors. He spoke in high praise of the new Tally theatre in Los Angeles, on South Broadway, which seats 1,000 people, and in which a high quality film service and first-class singing form the program. The prices are 10, 20 and 30 cents, and the house shows to capacity at every presentation.

It is high time for the East to profit by the proved wisdom of the West. Where in New York, or Chicago, have we a straight motion picture theatre that will seat 1,000 people, and can we name a house that charges over 10 cents for pictures?

Family Theatres Keep up Fight.

The Chicago Family Theatre Managers' Association has offered a counter ordinance to the one drafted by former Alderman Jones, which aims at curtailing the privileges of Class 4 houses.

The managers' bill was presented, at a recent meeting of the City Council Building Committee, by Mr. Presenthal, a partner of Alderman Milton J. Foreman.

The draft proposes that the small houses be permitted to retain the use of two sets of scenery and makes some concessions toward the reforms sought in the Jones bill. The managers agree to install sprinkler systems.

P. J. Schaefer, who is custodian of the defense fund raised by the association, addressed the committee. He later stated that no opposition to the managers' proposal is looked for on the council floor if the committee ratifies it.

It is known, however, that the managers fear a protest from the Iroquois Memorial Association, which is active for all measures seeking fire protection in theatres.

Chicago Film Brevities.

By a regrettable oversight, in my review of "The Rival Barons," which appear in Oct. 22 issue, I gave Gaumont the credit for producing that film, instead of Urban-Eclipse. I had seen several films, of both makes, run off that afternoon, and in this way confused the names. I regret it all the more, as I have always a hearty desire to give Eclipse credit for a strong, engaging drama.

"Pals of the Range," released Saturday, Oct. 22, is pronounced one of the strongest Western feature films yet released by the Essanay Company. The Indian fight is realistic and the scenery beautiful.

The Essanay release dates, commencing Tuesday, Nov. 1, will be on Tuesday and Saturday, instead of Wednesday and Saturday, as heretofore.

The manager of the machine and supply department of the Kleine Optical Co., at 52 State street, is pluming himself on the large increase in the number of sales of the Edengraph machine for the past month.

C. C. Coyne and his manager, George Martin, who will open the East End theatre in Moline, Ill., Saturday, Oct. 22, visited the General Film Company's offices, at 85 Dearnborn street, last week, and purchased an entire outfit, including machines and supplies, and also arranged for a high quality service. Moving pictures and songs only will be used in the program.

D. C. McClelland, formerly owner of the Dreamland theatre, Pekin, Ill., and who has just purchased the Palace theatre of that city, called at the General Film Company's offices, at 85 Dearborn street, one day last week, and arranged for a high class film service. He also purchased a machine and supplies.

John Hardin, Western manager of the Edison Manufacturing Company, has informed me that his company will begin to release a third reel on Nov. 1. Mr. Hardin also tells me that type B Edison machine is growing more popular daily, and that the demand is increasing right along.

Phil. Vandenberg, of Norway, Mich., will open a new theatre Saturday, Oct. 22, in his home city. He purchased a complete Edison outfit from the General Film Company, at 85 Dearborn street, last week, and made arrangements for a fine film service.

H. Smith, formerly of the Star theatre, Beloit, Wis., is looking out for a theatre location in some good town and neighborhood. He will purchase, lease or build. His permanent address is Beloit, Wis.

The Enterprise Optical Co. advises me that Edward H. Kemp, 833 Market street, San Francisco, has taken the agency for the Motiograph. For many years, Mr. Kemp has represented the Charles Beseler Co., of New York, and is thoroughly versed in the technicalities of optical projection.

Sidney W. Smith, the expert booking manager for the Thielen circuit, advises me that the Elgin Opera House, which makes the tenth theatre on that circuit, was opened Monday, Oct. 10. The Opera House has a seating capacity of 1,200 and is playing to good business. Mr. Thielen also owns the Star and Temple theatres in Elgin, which show straight pictures only, so that he is obliged to book vaudeville with pictures in the Opera House, in order to vary the bill. Mr. Smith states that 14 first run reels are used on the Thielen circuit weekly, and 55 reels in all.

NEW POSTER FRAMES TAKE WELL.

We learn from the Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Company that the handsome new poster frame designed by them has met with the instant favor of a great many exhibitors throughout the country. The new device consists of several lithographed sheets, which when put together make a perfect frame for posters illustrating various "licensed" film productions. The lithographed frames fit on a regular three-sheet poster board and the film poster is placed in the center. They are exceedingly ornamental and are made up in many color schemes to harmonize with the color of any theatre front.

We wish to correct the statement made last week that the special insert sheets are designed to fill the center space for those not wishing to use the film posters. We have learned since that these insert sheets are for use at the bottom of the frame poster and read: "A New A. B.," "A New Vitagraph Life Portrayal," "Coming To-morrow," etc.

A facsimile of the poster is reproduced in the advertising columns of this issue.

The new nickelette on Main street, Archbald, Pa., is nearing completion, and will open sometime in the next two weeks.

PROJECTION DEPARTMENT.

10.30 p. m. sharp, and in that time he runs fifteen reels and four illustrated songs.

To figure it out:

15 reels of film at 11 minutes a reel would take 165 minutes; 4 illustrated songs, at 5 minutes per song, would take 20 minutes; Threading Machine, 15 times, at 1 1-2 minutes per threading, would take 22 minutes; total 207 1-2 minutes.

Running Time.—The show starts at 7 p. m. and closes down at 10.30 p. m., which equals 210 minutes; so the difference, 2 1-2 minutes, is what the operator has for himself? So you can see that in giving such a show as this it is impossible to keep the film on the machine. I do not wonder that the film kept continually jumping off.

This is only one of the many conditions that exist, and the sooner the managers of picture theatres wake up to the fact that running a less number of reels and having the reels run as they should be, the better work they will get out of the operators; for there is no operator who can stand working at the rate this Brooklyn operator was working and give a good show, and a good show is what every operator likes to give, but he cannot give a good show when these conditions exist.

ANOTHER EDISON REEL.

Edison Company Announces Another Full Reel to the Weekly Schedule of Releases.

Beginning November 1st, three full reels will be released from the Edison Studio weekly, instead of two as heretofore. Their release days hereafter will be Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

In announcing the new schedule the Edison people gratefully acknowledge the courtesy of the Essanay Company which cheerfully accommodated them by moving its Wednesday release one day forward, which obviated the necessity of a change in the present Edison release days.

The Edison people plead guilty to a pardonable pride over the fact that the increasing demand for their film has compelled them to add this new release. They consider it the logical appreciation of their systematic and untiring efforts, for the past two years particularly, to uplift the standard of the art by improving the character of their own films.

More than to any other man connected with the Edison Company credit for the wonderful strides made in their films is due to their capable manager of Negative Production, Mr. Horace G. Plimpton. It is now two years since he was appointed to the position, and it is a matter of common knowledge that the improvement made in all departments was coincident with his assumption of the managerial office.

Mr. Plimpton brought comparatively little intimate knowledge of the motion picture business to the position, although his training in other lines of work had given him a keen eye to the artistic and peculiarly qualified him for the work in hand. He began his work from the bottom upward, first directing his attention to the scenario, the preparation of which, it seemed to him, was of such vital importance to the complete success of the picture as to demand the services of experienced dramatists. He accordingly enlisted the exclusive services of some of the most prominent writers in the country, such as Richard Harding Davis, Rex Beach, Roy Norton, Carolyn Wells, E. W. Townsend and others of like calibre, who became regular contributors to Edison products. He even succeeded in inducing that Prince of American humorists, the late lamented Mark Twain, to collaborate in the production of his immortal "The Prince and the Pauper."

This department taken care of, Mr. Plimpton took up the producing end of the business and soon surrounded himself with some of the most capable producers in the country. A stock company of twelve members was next recruited from the ranks of the theatrical profession and carefully instructed in the requirements of the "silent drama." This stock company is composed of actors and actresses who have won their spurs in the support of some of the leading "stars" of the legitimate stage. It has been augmented from time to time by theatrical luminaries well known to the general public, such for instance as Cecil Spooner and Mlle. Pilar Morin.

In the photographic and other branches of the art, old ideas and methods were supplanted by new. New fields were explored for the purpose of providing variety in theme as well as suitable locale for the pictures; as a consequence of which the public was given the memorable Cuban releases and the Northwestern Canada pictures.

Mr. Plimpton's aim has been to depart from the beaten path and give the Edison picture an individuality all its own—an originality of them and treatment which would distinguish it from all other films. Edison films are today recognized as films of quality, of novelty, variety and pleasing surprises; and in the deserved recognition which they are meeting as such Mr. Plimpton can look with pleasure on the fruits of his labor.

ESSANAY CHANGES WEDNESDAY RELEASE TO TUESDAY.

The Essanay Company announces a change in their Wednesday release dates from Wednesday to Tuesday, beginning November 1. The first Tuesday release will be "A Fortunate Misfortune" for Tuesday, Nov. 1, and "The Masquerade Cop" and "Hank and Lank," Tuesday, Nov. 8.

The Essanay Company's Tuesday release, as formerly, will be comedy chiefly, although there are a number of high class dramas and comedy dramas which will be released on this date.

SPRINGFIELD FIRM TAKES OVER THE SPA.

The Berkshire Spa, Pittsfield, Mass., a photoplay theatre situated in the Ryan block on North street, which has been conducted for a number of years by A. H. Sawyer and during the past few months by A. H. Sawyer and Edward Hamilton, has been sold to several Springfield men who will continue to conduct the theatre here under the name "The Spa Amusement Company." The new firm took possession on Monday, October 10.

F. S. Eager is the manager of the theatre. He has had considerable experience in the motion picture business, having previously managed theatres in Boston and Springfield. Mr. Hamilton, who has been resident manager of the Spa during the absence of Mr. Sawyer from the city, will continue in the employ of the new management. Mr. Hamilton will preside at the piano, which position he formerly held at the Spa before becoming manager.

In addition to up-to-date motion pictures and songs, the new management plans to secure musical novelties to be presented each week in addition to the pictures.

NO MORE STANDING ROOM IN BUTTE THEATRES.

At a meeting of the judiciary committee of the common council of Butte, Mont., that body passed an ordinance last week whereby all photoplay managers will not be allowed to sell more tickets than there are seats. This is done to prevent theatres running pictures to become over crowded, and cause unfavorable comment from the fire department and citizens who do not favor such entetainment.

While the managers have no complaint so far as the ordinance is concerned, and are anxious to comply with the same, they are now going before the committee and ask for an amendment that will allow them (the managers) to provide waiting rooms in the lobby of the theatres, where patrons can wait until a performance is over. The enforcement of this ordinance will be in the hands of the building inspector.

P—"Good morning! Do you carry in stock all makes of moving picture machines, and can you give me a demonstration of their operation?"

S—"Yes, I have them all here on the floor ready to exhibit and shall be only too glad to have you decide for yourself which machine you want."

(After running a reel of film through each machine and careful examination of the operation and mechanism of the various types, the purchaser decides.)

P—"I have decided on the Motiograph, and you may enter my order for immediate shipment."

S—"Thanks for the order. By the way, you are operating on alternating current and, of course, will want a current saver that will save you two-thirds or more on your bill and at the same time give you fully a third better light. This you can only secure by installing the Hallberg Economizer."

P—"My son has investigated this matter and says that the Economizer has no switch to give various degrees of light, and he wants a current saver that will, and on the advice of a Film Exchange, he has made up his mind to buy a current saver that has a switch."

S—"Do you know that the Hallberg Economizer is absolutely automatic and does not need a switch and at the same time can be set for various strengths of illumination as desired, for long or short throws, large or small, light or dark pictures?"

P's Son—"No, I was told exactly the contrary."

S—"Come into the exhibition room and let me demonstrate these facts."

(Demonstration.)

P's Son—"Well, I am surprised to see that the Hallberg automatically performs all these operations without the use of a switch and will thus save my operator a lot of trouble and time and he can give his entire attention to producing a better picture."

S—"I am glad you recognize these important features and want you to understand that I am the Pioneer in this line of business and have been all through the question of using hand-operated controlling switches. My experience decided me to make the Hallberg automatic, notwithstanding the necessary increase in cost of manufacture."

P's Son—"You have convinced me. Can you ship a Hallberg to-day with the Motiograph?"

S—"Yes sir, and thank you for the order."

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.
De Witt C. Wheeler.

"SWEET RED ROSES."—Words and music by Anita Owen; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. The illustrations for this set are posed in the old Colonial costume. The coloring of these costumes is most vivid and realistic, and the set seems to carry one back to the olden days. Some very original and beautiful novelties are contained therein, and the natural scenery is beyond comparison.

"THE LONGER WE'RE TOGETHER THE HARDER IT IS TO PART."—Lyric by Earle Clinton; music by Lamonte Jones; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. A love ballad on the semi-hign class order. The slides are unusually good for a love ballad, embodying many dark, rich evening scenes and a number of feature slides. The light effects are very soothing and beautiful.

Scott & Van Altena.

"I LOVE IT."—Words by E. Ray Goetz; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Harry Von Tilzer Pub. Co., New York. "It" is a little word, but can mean many big things. In this case "it" refers to ragtime. "Pansy Anna Lincoln" loves ragtime. You would think so to see her in this set of slides. For a comedy set and one full of corking good novelties, this is "IT" in every respect.

"I'M LOOKING FOR A NICE YOUNG FELLOW."—Words by Jeff. T. Branen; music by S. R. Henry; published by Jos. W. Stern Co., New York. Here's your chance, you young, good looking exhibitors. What? Not young? Then perhaps YOU are looking for something nice. Get this clever set. It will cheer you up.

"GIRL OF MY DREAMS."—Words and music by Gene Emerson; published by Harold Rossiter Music Co., Chicago. A love ballad of the high class order, illustrated by slides evidencing the expert skill and exquisite coloring of the firm of Scott & Van Altena.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"I'M GOING TO TAKE THE TRAIN FOR HOME, SWEET HOME."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham, author of such world-famous hits as "Hoo-Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-Night?" "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Roses Bring Dreams of You." Published by Shapiro. This is the last song written by this wonderfully versatile composer, and Simpson has shown his knowledge of stagecraft by the clever grouping of actors in their varied poses. The hero is shown spurning the temptations of the big city, the return to the old farm, the suburban station, country lanes, life on the farm, etc. There are a couple of novelty slides, too—such as are in such great demand just now.

"SKIPPER SUSIE GREENE."—Written and composed by the celebrated author, Don Ramsay, author of "Some Day When Dreams Come True," "You Look Just Like a Girl I Used to Know," "The Star of Love is Burning in My Heart for You;" published by Walter Jacobs, Boston, Mass. A pretty story is told in this tuneful little melody; the children sailing their toy boat gave a great chance for artistic pictures and exquisite coloring. The second verse shows the return of the sailor to his home by the sea; and taking all in all this is considered by Simpson to be one of the best sets of slides he has ever made.

Levi Company, Inc.

"SWEET MAID OF PANG-O-ISLE."—One of the best songs written by that great song genius, Herbert Ingraham. Unlike other writers, he never puts his name to anything that does not justify popular approval, and in "Pang-o-Isle" he gives us the most beautiful melody of them all. This song has just been published by Shapiro, and will undoubtedly prove a big hit. The slides are exceptionally good, models being posed in native Indian costumes.

"TURN THOSE EYES AWAY."—Words and music by Billy Brent; published by Shapiro. Here is another big song by Billy Brent with a fine set of lyrics to a very pretty melody. The slides are highly artistic in every detail, both in photography and color.

The following two songs, released last week by Levi Co., were placed by mistake among those of Alfred L. Simpson.

"WHO'S LOONY NOW?"—Lyrics by Edgar Selden; music by Zit, of the Evening Journal. This is the big number that Eva Tanguay, Bobby North and other famous headliners are creating a big sensation with; a song right up to the minute, with a good catchy melody, and bound to create enthusiasm wherever sung. The slides are all novelties of exceptional merit, and will produce a laugh even from the veriest pessimist.

"YOU CAN'T MAKE ME STOP LOVING YOU."—Words by Edgar Leslie; music by Kerry Mills. This is a song that has already made good, and is now being sung throughout the country. The slides are first class, with some very original novelties. The models are both good looking.

LAST FOUR WEEKS' PRODUCTION.
De Witt C. Wheeler.

"MAYBE YOU'RE NOT THE ONLY ONE WHO LOVES ME."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by George Botsford; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York.

VITAL STATISTICS OF PICTURES.

An Interesting Compilation Not Made by the Census Takers of the Current Year.

One of the facts to be brought out in the census of the United States for 1910 is the number of persons who are wholly or partially deaf. The figures are not announced yet, but the statistics of the picture world are available and the answer is that it all depends.

The man who placidly murders the old miser or who forges the millionaire's will may not be deaf, although he does not hear the fairy footfalls of a person weighing 180 pounds who is walking on his heels two feet to the rear. This is merely the temporary deafness known as one form of directoritis and is caused by the fact that the director explained before the picture was turned that Smith did not hear Jones when the latter stole on the scene to assure himself of Smith's villainy, that the mystery may be cleared up in the 27th scene. The husband watching behind the curtains may kick over a chair, but his eloping wife has ears only for the persuasive villain unless it is in the script that the chair was kicked over.

The director of the picture census will report that 100 per cent. of the population are occasionally deaf.

More interesting are the figures dealing with gunshot wounds. Perhaps the most curious fact is that at close range 99 per cent. of the casualties are inflicted by deflected bullets, the shot being fired into the ground or off the scene and rebounding upon the victim. The gun is not aimed straight.

In accidents which do not terminate fatally the wound is received in the left hand or arm except when the author directs that the victim be shot in the leg that locomotion may be impeded.

In those accidents which terminate fatally 60 per cent. are also punctures of the arm (left). All other fatal gunshots are received in the chest where the wound will be effectively displayed when the shirt is torn open in the death agony. In this connection it is interesting to note that all fatalities in which death does not occur within 27 seconds the victim is certain to live through one or more additional scenes.

Male victims who are rendered temporarily unconscious by shock are affected by a quickening of the sub-consciousness which enables them to aid the persons handling them at critical moments. This peculiar condition becomes more acute when the leading man is heavy and is lifted to a couch by a lightweight heroine.

In incised wounds sustained from an edged weapon the cut or slash is seldom or never followed by hemorrhage and bandages applied seldom or never become stained by secondary hemorrhage.

The loss of a limb is practically unrecorded, the proportion being .00001 of 1 per cent.; most inhabitants of pictures being provided with a full complement of members and being unwilling to lose any of them in the interests of art.

Deaths from lingering illness never occur until the stricken parent has had time to commend her orphaned child to the care of some kindly person. If the death bed scene has been violent there is a marked respiration in the corpse until the close of the scene. As further evidence of sensation after death several instances have been reported in which the corpse wriggled its nose to dislodge a tormenting fly.

In western countries the mortality is about evenly divided between cowboys, Indians and greasers. The old fallacy that the only good Indian is a dead one is disproved by the latest figures of the picture census wherein it is shown that but 3.75 per cent. of good Indians are killed while 91.8 of the bad ones are shot by rescuing cowboys. The cowboy is also invariably fatal to greasers if taken in large quantities, while friendly Indians have a most fatal effect on bad cowboys and outlaws.

Deaths by drowning are very rare in the last census, though it is anticipated by the director of the picture census that the recent additions to the Vitagraph navy will materially increase these figures before the taking of the next census. Almost no disasters to large vessels are recorded, the rowboat being the most frequent cause of loss of life.

Consumption and broken heart are the most common cause of death in the case of women, while amongst the children excessive goodness is even more fatal than cholera morbus. In most instances the death of a child is marked by the reconciliation of its parents immediately before the infantile dissolution. In this connection it might be remarked that the low rate of divorce is directly traceable to childish influences and not to the high cost of a ticket to Reno from the more densely populated East. The divorce rate is remarkably low and permanent wife desertion is almost entirely confined to those marriages between white miners or cowboys and Indian wives.

In the period covered by the last census there is no authentic case recorded wherein a child stolen by gypsies was not recovered within a reasonable time. For convenience two reasonable periods of time have been established:

(a) Within a few weeks.

(b) After a lapse of years sufficient to make it necessary for the grown child to look exactly like the one earlier seen.

The director of the picture census is compiling from the records other interesting facts which will be issued in the form of bulletins from time to time prior to the issuance of the complete report.

AMERICAN PLAYERS IN IRELAND.

tongues. The old grandmother, who was to play my grandmother in the story, almost cried with joy, and would call me nothing else but her 'own little colleen.' She is eighty-five years old and crippled with rheumatism; but she was so happy at the thought that her chidren in America would be able to see her; for she has several sons and daughters over here, as nearly every old couple in Ireland has. We have the addresses of relatives all over the states, and they will be notified and be enabled to see the little cottages in which they were born, the neighbors they knew as youths, and the old mother and father who never cease talking of the 'bye in America.' And let me say right here, that every Irishman is a natural born actor. They were easy to handle, and obeyed instructions implicitly—very different from the crowds one gets in America.

"Of course, we went to Blarney Castle, and got fine pictures of it, too. Mr. Olcott and I kissed the Blarney Stone, and we were the only ones in the crowd who did, for while the old way of hanging down from the top by your heels is done away with, because of the danger, it is still a hazardous feat, and I have not yet heard of another girl who performed it. Even men take one look down at the rocks 120 feet below, and their nerve fails. You must lie flat on your back, grasp iron bars on the wall opposite, have two friends hold your heels, and go downward, then up under the opening in the wall a good four feet below. I thought I would never stop going, but I kissed it, and have been cultivating a sweet persuasive tongue ever since. Our Jarvey told about a girl who remained on top of the castle two hours trying to get courage to attempt the feat, and came away crying and without accomplishing it. But she said she was going to come prepared as to costume the next day. So she did; he brought her out again, but she waited around for hours and finally owned herself defeated. 'An' thot's the nearest I ever heard of a loidy kissin' the Schtone, Miss,' he said.

"From Cork we went to Killarney, where many scenes were taken. The Gap of Bunloe, overlooking the lakes as you wind up the hills on horseback, is wonderful in its rugged scenery and constant surprises. After the first stretch you look back over Serpent Lake. 'Tis here it was, St. Patrick, one day drove all the schnakes into a big iron box. 'Tis lettin' yez out I'll be to-morrow,' he promised them, as he sunk the box in Serpent Lake. 'Why, did St. Patrick tell a lie?' asked my driver. 'Faith, an he did not: to-morrow never comes, you know!' So the poor snakes are still in their iron box at the bottom of the lake, waiting for to-morrow.

"All along the rocky road through the hills, colleens wait to waylay you with their 'bit 'o goats mik, and drap of potheen, which the kind gentleman will be a havin' while no one is lookin'? But I must not forget to mention the horses. Some hundred drivers with ponies wait for the crowds each day the weather is right and there is no blow, to ride through the Gap to the Upper Lake, where boats rowed by four sturdy boatmen make the fourteen-mile trip down the Lakes, as the Lakes are so treacherous that it is impossible to go on windy days. But the horses, poor things, they would long ago have found their way to the 'home for discrepit animals' over here—or the butchers in France. The master walks behind them with a whip, and we amble along on broken saddles, almost too uncomfortable to enjoy the scenes we are passing through. Yes, we took scenes with them, but a horse never looks as bad in a picture as he really is.

"From Killarney (wher it rains every day, by the way), we went to Dublin, and attended the Horse Show —so different from ours. Everything is in the open, and there are numerous rings for showing, where you lean against the rails with lords and coachmen and beautifully gowned women (the men wear only riding togs); or stroll on broad walks, take your tea, and pay but little attention to what's going on.

"If it hadn't been for the constant rain in Ireland, we would have been sorry to leave; but that's the reason it is the Emerald Isle. Wherever there isn't grass there is moss as thick as velvet. Flowers wherever you turn, even growing from the thatched roofs of the cottages. Fuchias that reach to the tops of the houses in flowering trees—everywhere a luxury of growth.

"The most impressive things about Ireland? First, its wonderful beauty, then its beautiful children, its lovable, delightful people (you couldn't help loving an Irishman, even though you know he's blarneying you), and—Oh, yes, the fact that in all of Ireland I saw but one pig, and he was the biggest, whitest, fattest, most petted pig I ever saw. However, if you see 'The Lad From Old Ireland' you will see the best that we saw."

NEW PHOTOPLAY HOUSE FOR HUNTINGTON.

It is assured that Huntington, W. Va., is to have another photoplay theatre, one that is of the highest type, operated under the direction of a prominent Huntington official and located in the Majestic building in Fourth avenue.

The deal is already closed and the new theatre will be in operation within the very near future. The idea of the proprietor is to at first operate only a photoplay theatre and later to introduce vaudeville features. The location is excellent for the business, being central and where thousands pass daily and near the loading and unloading points for the through cars as well as those of the inner city lines.

SAM TRIGGER MOVES INDOORS FOR WINTER.

Sam Trigger, who runs the Pastime Airdome, at 110th street and Fifth avenue, will close that place this week and move into his photoplay house that adjoins the airdome. Mr. Trigger reports that during the past summer he did an excellent business and adds that he believes for summer amusement the airdome has come to stay.

Audiences, claims Mr. Trigger, like to be entertained in the open and that as motion pictures are the most practical amusement, it is easier to attract patrons at an open-air theatre than indoors. No matter how cool a manager can make his house, there is nothing like being outside with the moon and stars above you during the summer months. Mr. Trigger is one of the managers who firmly belieevs in the lighted photoplay theatre.

Excavating work on the new vaudeville and motion picture theatre on Promenade street, Mexico, Mo., is nearly completed. The house will be ready for the opening performance sometime in November.

Rallo Perry opened his new picture theatre at Waverly, N. Y., Sept. 23.

Mrs. J. H. Lynde, of Milwaukee, Wis., has applied for a permit for the erection of a new $18,000 building at Kenneckinnic avenue and Ellen street. The building will contain a first class picture theatre.

Tony Sinclair, of Peoria, Ill., has purchased the Dreamland motion picture theatre owned by O. W. McClellan.

W. H. Mason, of Hancock, Mich., is planning to erect an up-to-date picture theatre on Quincy street.

MOTION PICTURES BOOMING IN AUSTRALIA

Interesting Budget from Dr. W. H. H. Lane, Sydney, N. S. W.

IN the matter of motion pictures, this city has got the fever in its very worst form, where two years ago if there were ten in Cumberland County, of which Sydney is the county seat, there are now no less a number than 82 picture shows running, and applications in for an additional number of eighty more and all seem to be doing well. Now that warm weather is here, they will all do better than before, and there is no gainsaying the fact, but that the motion picture has been the means of lowering the police records as regards the arrest for drunkenness and offences against the laws concomitant with drinking, since these shows have been opened, and where we a short time back had no such thing as picture theatres, we now have numbers of them showing every Sunday evening, and unless you are early on hand, you have not the slightest chance of a seat, or standing room either.

No charges are allowed to be made at the door on Sunday, but the admission is a silver coin, and as the smallest coin is 6 cents of United States money, they seldom give on a Sunday so small a contribution, and so the houses take more money in on Sunday than on week days, and it keeps the people off the streets, and out of any trouble, for the old saying is, "Satan finds some mischief still, for idle hands to do." I feel confident that if the police were to have their way that every place of amusement in this city would be open on a Sunday. No drama or vaudeville turns are allowed under any pretext whatever. Even illustrated songs must be strictly sentimental or sacred on Sundays, and no funny films of any sort can be shown on that day either. All films for Sundays are censored, and very strictly censored, too.

"Man was made for the Sabbath, and not the Sabbath made for man," is the rule on this side of the world. Now there is the thin edge of the wedge in, and to the writer's mind it will not be long before the wedge is slowly and surely driven home. But not without a big opposition on the part of the Church which wields a most powerful influence in matters that keep the "tray bits" as the three penny piece is called, out of the Church collections. They are already raising their voice against the direful calamities that will overtake this fair land if the strict sanctity of the Sabbath day is not upheld according to the commands laid down in the book of Genesis.

The way that they are running up theatres over here for the exploitation of the "still show," as they call the motion pictures, only goes to show that either there will be a decided reaction set in, or else there will be more and more put up until it will be the survival of the fittest. But, to the writer's mind, pictures are only in their infancy, and when the saving clause in the motion picture business comes in the way of a sterioscopic picture, in place of the flat one as now shown, there will be a still greater boom in that line. The writer has been at work on that line for some time and has succeeded far beyond his most sanguine expectations, so much so, that I am about to apply for a series of Patents in the United States and elsewhere along these lines.

On Friday last, Sept. 23d, the new King's Theatre was thrown open for a press and private exhibition of the programme to be submitted to the public on the following day, and I must say, that it would have been much better for them had they had one or two private rehearsals before they gave one to the press, because of the failures made on this occasion, for the saying, "first impressions are the most lasting," holds good in this case especially. This theatre will comfortably seat 1,200 people, and is a very fine and comfortable house, with all up to date improvements. It should reap its share of what is doing in that line, if it only gives to the public what the public demands. But as they are within about twenty or thirty feet of the entrance to the old established firm of West's Limited, they have got to make good, or else the public will go where they know they will be well served, as they are at the aforesaid show. Not only that; were there no pictures, the music alone is well worth the price of admission, and that in all cases, is one thing that has made the name of West a household word.

West's have in this part of the world, no less than twenty-four permanent shows, located in all the large cities of the Commonwealth, and they have also some twenty or more traveling shows that keep the small towns well supplied in the M. P. business, with good music, a leading feature all the time. Most of the theatres have to rent their films from the film exchanges, and while there are a few exceptions, these are the larger and the older firms.

It is a great pleasure to see the number of "Pop" Lubin's films, that have been shown and are being shown at the present time, on the bill of most of the places open to the public. I am glad, for I like his work and they get, I can assure him, "the glad hand" every time they are shown. They were shown here for some time, and then for months you never saw one in a single programme submitted to the public, so much so, that in various letters I have, in writing of these places, called attention to the fact. I think that our mutual friend Mr. J. D. Williams has had a great deal to do with their return, and I am informed that he has now a large supply of all the latest ones on order for his wants. I am glad, also, to say that Williams is holding his own and doing a very large renting business with all of the M. P. P. Co.'s products. The way that

AT last the cause of the "light house" has triumphed in New York City. Elsewhere in this issue of The Film Index is printed the announcement that Mayor Gaynor has directed his Commissioner of Licenses to order all picture theatres to light their auditoriums. Commissioner Oliver, who has charge of this work, has made a careful investigation of picture theatre conditions in Greater New York and knows their faults to the last degree. The lighting question has been investigated by him and he knows that the disreputable "dark house" is an evil to be abated and has given due notice to the managers and owners of such places that the conditions complained of must no longer continue.

This information is particularly pleasing to The Film Index. For the past two years it has urged that "darkness" be abolished in picture theatres and has pointed out to theatre managers the mistake they made by keeping their auditoriums dark when so much was to be gained by turning on the light. Whether or not the efforts of The Index have had any influence in hastening official action, the desired result has been accomplished in New York.

ANOTHER statement reported as coming from Commissioner Oliver is that personally, he denies having seen any immoral pictures and further reports that, during the past year the complaints against pictures have diminished to an almost negligible quantity. The Commissioner made these remarks before an Aldermanic committee appointed to hold public hearings on a proposed ordinance to censor pictures for New York City. Other remarks by the Commissioner leads to the conclusion that the proposed ordinance will never become active, for the very sufficient reason that it is not needed. There are sufficient laws upon the books at present to take care of all the abuses that may creep into the motion picture business.

IT developed during the hearing that two members of the Aldermanic committee evinced a keen desire to invest each Alderman with power to govern the picture theatres in his respective district. Beautiful scheme that. We heard of the Aldermanic graft in newsstand and bootblack privileges, which may or may not be true and of course none of the present Board of Aldermen would think of grafting upon the picture theatres; but with such an arrangement on the books there would be a chance for some unscrupulous Aldermen, who may be elected in the future, to hold up the picture men. Nothing of this sort will pass, however.

REPORT now has it that there will soon be something doing in "independent" circles. There is to be a meeting of "independent" exchanges soon and the several peculiar requirements of the "Sales Company" are to be talked over. Manufacturers are requested to keep out. "Independent" exchange men are beginning to discover that the Patents Company proposition is a mere kindergarten problem to the game they are up against with the "Sales Company."

Everything that comes from the "Sales Company" is C. O. D. and that is not all; every exchange getting film through the "Sales Company" is required to deposit $1,200 as security. Nice and soft for the Laemmle-Kessel combination.

The latest proposition to come to light is that made to the new American company of Chicago, which has been requested to pay a cash bonus of $5,000 and two cents per foot thereafter if it wants to market its product through the "Sales Company."

Now, everybody knows that the great philanthropist, Carl Laemmle, is president of the "Sales Company"; the champion of the downtrod and the everlasting enemy of the hated trust. Isn't it singular that he should be a party to such a hold-up game as that?

IT has also been intimated that there is soon to be launched another million dollar picture company that will make all the others look like counterfeit money. This concern is to come in and take care of all those who do not like the "Sales Company" or the Patents Company. It is promoted by one Clapham, formerly of the Theatre Film Service of San Francisco, who went through bankruptcy and stung every one who trusted him as he went through. We fancy that he will become a power in the picture business.

AS for the other poor independent film makers, they are leading a hand to mouth existence, entirely at the mercy of the Laemmle-Kessel gang of hold-up men. Some of them have quit active business, others have stopped work temporarily and still others are looking for money. The grave yard of defunct film makers is rapidly filling up and the grave digger is working overtime.

DENVER LIMITS PICTURE THEATRES

Commenting upon an editorial paragraph in a previous issue of The Film Index, concerning the multiplicity of motion picture theatres, Mr. James R. Noland, Sec. of the Fire and Police Board, of Denver, Colo., contributes the following information:

"It may be of interest to you to know that licenses of this kind are limited to about 1 per 10,000 population in Denver and that no new licenses have been issued for nearly two years. Transfers are permitted from one location to another but the applicant must have a licen transfer. As a result of this system a mot picture theatre license is worth $1,000 on th open market with a ready demand. And because the license has a real money value, the licensee is extremely careful as to the conduct of his house. This board controls these places of amusement and while no regular censorship is maintained, when complaint is made against an objectionable picture a telephone message results in its removal. All picture houses are well lighted, well ventilated and properly conducted in every way without police orders, to the mutual benefit of the proprietors, the public and this board."

"You are certainly giving value received for the money," says Mr. J. W. Shaw, manager of The Star, at Lexington, N. C. Mr. Shaw sends his renewal of subscription to The Index and declares that it is the best paper published in the interest of motion pictures.

AN ESSANAY INDIAN

The editor of The Film Index regrets the unfortunate circumstances that have prevented his meeting that distinguished American Indian, H. A. Spoor, big medicine man of the Essanay tribe, now doing the Sun Dance for the delectation of John Bull and his insular tribes. Accordingly we feel under obligations to The Bioscope for the above likeness, done by a celebrated Indian artist of the Bioscope tribe, commonly called "Peter," but was originally a distinguished medicine man of the Peterboro tribe, which had its hunting grounds near Peterboro, Ont. Hence, the sign manual. It will be noticed that Medicine Man Spoor carries at once a tomahawk and a pipe of peace, and wears a large question mark on his chest protector; also, that he is stripped for action and wears his war bonnet. The significance of these several items is that he is always ready for a fight. The question is: Are you showing Essanay photoplays? If so, he offers the pipe of peace; if not you get the axe. We give this interpretation, here indited for the first time, for the benefit of those who contemplate calling upon the distinguished Medicine Man of the tribe of Essanay.

PICTURE THEATRES MUST LIGHT UP

License Commissioner Oliver Notifies Managers in New York to Abolish Dark Auditoriums—Orders From Mayor Gaynor

COMMISSIONER of Licenses Francis Oliver, Jr., announced before the Aldermanic committee on the proposed ordinance for the censorship of films, that Mayor Gaynor had authorized him to direct all motion picture theatres in New York City to light up their auditoriums. He said that letters were then being prepared by him to send to every exhibitor in the city of New York to notify them of the Mayor's latest order.

The announcement was made during a very comprehensive speech by the Commissioner at the public hearing, Wednesday, Oct. 26, before the committee relative to the ordinance recently introduced by Alderman White providing for the official municipal censorship of pictures. He sauntered into the great, impressive Aldermanic Chamber shortly after some of the women folk, who, during their spare moments, take upon themselves the task of eliminating all that is naughty in this world, had arisen, and with tears in their eyes told of how "those awful motion pictures" set our young astray and make criminals of them. It would seem, by the gist of their talk, that John Smith had been arrested for stealing. Last month John Smith had attended pretty regularly the picture show. Therefore, be it resolved that motion pictures lead our young to crime. Anyhow, the Commissioner did not feel nearly so alarmed about them, nor did he shed a single tear.

He said that he had visited just about every theatre in New York City, and never had he nor Mayor Gaynor seen an immoral or indecent picture. In fact the exhibition of such pictures is already unlawful because there is in the Penal Code a provision against the public exhibition of anything of an immoral or indecent character, or of a tendency to injure the health or morals of the community. Violation of that code is a misdemeanor.

The Commissioner did not wish it understood that he was in anyway against the passing of the proposed ordinance. He merely wished to acquaint the committee with the result of his own personal investigations and of complaints received. Regarding the latter, he said that since the establishment of the present National Board of Censors, complaints had dropped to a negligible quantity, and that, in no case did the complainant mention the name of the picture. Complaints for the most part regarded the darkness of the picture house, and Mayor Gaynor had already taken steps to stop that condition.

It took John Collier fifteen minutes to convince members of the committee that some people in this world work for nothing—that members of the present Censor Board received no pay. The estimable members of the Committee arched their eyebrows in surprise and a dampness seemed to settle over the room. But things were cheered up again when it was brought out that many of the exhibitors contributed to the good cause—for clerical expenses, etc. In fact, several of the Aldermen suggested that each Alderman censor pictures and picture shows in his own district.

Vaudeville was horribly knocked at this meeting. The cheap, disgusting vaudeville that is generally procured by picture theatre managers was condemned by all factions present as really the most vulgar and harmful part of the performance. But the hearing was on the censorship of films, so the committee tabooed this subject.

Finally Alderman White, father of the ordinance, after expounding copiously on his own broadness of mind, sounded the keynote of the meeting with this appeal:

"Is there anyone here who doubts the ability of Aldermen to censor films?"

What could the dear ladies say? They were no doubt disconcerted, and the long silence even made some of them fidgity. Over in one corner a well known downtown lawyer was smiling to himself and his neighbor, also a lawyer, was beaming with amusement. Finally one tender voiced lady answered:

"Really, Mr. Alderman, we don't doubt you're —you're—a-ability. That is—I mean—we are afraid you cannot spare the time."

The hearing was then further adjourned until Wednesday, Nov. 16.

Those present at the meeting besides the committee were John Collier and Walter Story of the National Board of Censors; Messrs. Donegan and Driscoll, representing the New York Exhibitors Association; Mr. McClintock of the Society for the Prevention of Crime; Miss Moss of the Society for the Prevention of Vice; representatives of the Women's Municipal League and of various other associations for the Civic and Moral welfare of New York.

While Commissioner Oliver did not say as much, his remarks made it quite plain that Mayor Gaynor was not in sympathy with the movement, and would probably veto the ordinance if passed.

LETTER SENT TO THEATRE MANAGERS.

Mayor's Office.
BUREAU OF LICENSES, CITY HALL,
New York.
October 27, 1910.

Sir: Many of the moving picture shows in this city are given in rooms which are totally dark, or almost dark, while the pictures are being displayed. Tests have proven that it is possible to display pictures in well lighted rooms. If moving picture shows are given in darkened rooms it is possible for many actions to take place without the knowledge of the owners or managers, which would not be tolerated if the owners or managers were aware of them. I need not go into detail, for the proposition is self-evident. The halls can be lighted up by many means now in use in many parts of the city, and which can be installed in any hall for a very moderate, if not nominal, price.

Therefore, I hereby inform you that by November 20, 1910, we will consider it a proper cause for the revocation of a moving picture show license if it is found that the pictures are displayed in halls that are not lighted up so that the persons in the audience are at all times easily visible.

Furthermore, I call your attention to the fact that many persons have been convicted under the penal laws for admitting children without escorts, or improperly escorted, into moving picture shows. This practice must stop. The action of the licensing authority in revoking a license held by a person convicted of a crime has been sustained by the courts of this State.

Therefore, I hereby inform you that persons who are convicted of the crime of permitting children to enter under the conditions forbidden by law are in danger of having their licenses revoked or suspended.

I take it for ganted, and I know it to be a fact in most instances, that the moving picture show proprietors are constantly working to gain the public good will and stop the criticisms which have been directed against this business.

I call the above matters to your attention and urge you to comply with each of them, as I deem them steps for the betterment of the business, and which will have a great tendency to prevent any just criticsm of the conduct of the picture shows in this city.

By direction of Chief of Bureau.
Respectfully,
(Signed) FRANCIS V. S. OLIVER, JR.,
Deputy Chief of Bureau.

INDIAN LEGEND PICTURED

Pathe American Company Performs Daring Feats at Niagara Falls

TWO MORE INDIAN MAIDENS SWEPT OVER CATARACT.

World Will Soon See in Picture Legend of Spirit of Niagara.

Frail Canoes Swallowed Up in Roaring Waters.

Make Plunge as Sun, Peeping Over Horizon, Makes Spray a Rainbow.

Simultaneous with the bright sunshine of the early morn, two Indian maidens made the trip over Niagara Falls to-day. They have not been recovered.

The maidens were to all appearances as fair as the charming Minnehaha, and possessed all of the subtle charms of "Rainbow," Arrawanah (who married Barney Kearney) and others made famous in song and story. The sun was flashing the most picturesque rainbows in the spray, and the great cataract roared a greeting as the frail Indian lassies were sent along the tumbling waters—never to return.

To the few present it was possible to think of the Aborigines, Neuters and Seneca tribes when this was a land of Indians paddling about in their frail birch canoes.

However, the Indian maidens referred to today died for art's sake, for the sake of the motion pictures, or in other words, to illustrate the Indian legend of The Maid of the Mist, representing the Indians as holding the spirit of Cataract in great awe, and of sacrificing a maiden of the tribe annually by sending her over the Falls in a canoe laden with fruits of the earth and the chase, in the belief that such an offering would influence the spirit of the waters to favor the tribe in war and peace. The prettiest maidens were always chosen, and it is said that the tradition was lived up to for years after the discovery of the cataract by Father Hennepin.

The miniature maidens, bedecked in all of the finery an artist could paint, with canoe in hand, surrounded by make believe flowers, were sent over the mighty waterfall by the Pathe Freres American Company, who also sent a canoe over the Falls yesterday.

The above appeared in a recent number of the Cataract News, Niagara Falls, N. Y., and upon inquiry of Pathe Freres we ascertained that they had just finished a most pretentious picture relating to Niagara Falls. Great risks were taken in order to get just what was wanted at Niagara, for it was only by forming a human chain and wading out from Suicide Point, which is 150 feet above the brink, that the canoes were successfully started on their perilous journey. In connection with this picture a large number of real Indians were used, some being brought long distances. Six of the best known war dancers were included. Their encampment, which is used in the picture, consists of no less than 32 tepees. It is anticipated that the photoplay of this well known legend will prove one of the most successful ever produced in this country. It will be released in December.

The accompanying illustrations are from the coming Pathe American subjects entitled "A Mexican Legend," and "A Gambler's End." Both western subjects due for early release.

The Mexican legend is founded upon a story of a colony of monks which was attacked by Indians, the abbe being brutally mistreated and cast alive into a stone tomb while the rest of the monks are held for torture. The tomb in which the abbe was cast chanced to be an entrance to a underground shrine where a figure of Christ had been painted in a niche cut in the living rock. The legend has it that this figure came to life and lead the abbe to a distant ranch house where aid was secured and the Indians are properly punished. The picture closes with a beautiful transformation scene of religious significance. The art of the picture maker is in evidence throughout this subject.

A GAMBLER'S END.

"A Gambler's End" is a somewhat melodramatic subject, the story of which is that of a dissolute gambler, who deserts his wife and manages to escape through his close resemblance to a suicide whose body he found near his home. Convinced that the suicide is her husband, his wife goes West and marries a ranchman. Some few years later the gambler appears up in a nearby town, gets in a row over a game of cards and kills a man. In attempting to make his escape he seeks refuge in the present home of his former wife, where he is met upon his entrance by a child who is, in fact, his own daughter. The little one has been taught that her father is dead and at the time a locket containing his picture hangs from her neck. She tells the strange man that her papa is in heaven and shows him the picture in the locket. He immediately recognizes his own features and is horror-stricken at the discovery. The husband appears at this point, is briefly told the story and is about to call the woman on the scene. The gambler insists that she be spared this further sorrow. At this point of the story the sound of galloping horses tells the gambler that his pursuers are on his trail. He draws his gun and goes out of the house to meet his end, which is speedily administered by a storm of bullets from the guns of his pursuers.

PHOTOPLAY THEATRE A BEAUTY

Clune's Los Angeles House the Best in Southern California—Boasts of Electric Sign.

The latest and perhaps most beautiful acquisition to Los Angeles' long list of theatres is the new photoplayhouse of Clune's, which opened Oct. 10, on South Broadway, is just north of Mercantile place. This house, which is a model of its kind, has been rushed to completion to accommodate, in a way, the overflow from the other Clune theatre, and, since it is as large as the older house, it is believed that it will be filled to capacity from the opening performance.

The new structure is superior to the other in many ways, although the seating capacity is the same, 900. Besides, many innovations new to Los Angeles and the West have been incorporated in this pretty picture theatre. A throughout the auditorium and the latest elecmyriad of concealed lights throw a soft glow trical effects have been employed to enhance the beauty of the house.

One of the innovations are the chimes and saucer bells. Although the chimes were bought from a big musical house in the East, the electrical construction and wiring and key board was arranged in Los Angeles. This will prove one of the great attractions of the theatre, as it is the purpose of the management to use the chimes and bells upon every possible occasion.

Being a photoplay house, it is the purpose of the management to show only the very highest class pictures along educational, comedy, zoological, aeronautical, dramatic, naval and military lines.

An illuminating feature of the new house is the electrical sign which is claimed to surpass anything west of New York. Eighteen hundred lamps were used in the sign, which has been tried out and found to work perfectly.

NEW HOUSE FOR NEW AURORA.

The New Aurora, a motion-picture parlor, with bowling allays and a billiard and poolroom on North avenue, near Charles street, New Aurora, O., was opened on the afternoon of Oct. 14, when it was well patronized.

There was a slight delay in the evening performance due to the lights in the building going out. This was caused by trouble to the transformer supplying current to the building.

The new parlor seats 370 persons. Mr. Eugene Cook, Sr., is proprietor and general manager of the place. He is assisted by Messrs. J. Benjamin and H. B. Cook and Charles Ryan.

"THE MARKED TRAIL"

Strong Western Dramatic Photoplay
By The Essanay Company

THE Essanay Western Company, noted for its high class Western comedies and melodramas, has awakened the interest of the exhibitors in the noteworthy advancements made in the quality of product of this year over their efforts of last. This is undoubtedly due to the relative increase in facilities, the addition of new talent and new environment. With their special car for the development of negatives while en route, which also carries camping equipment for the company, they are able to penetrate to the very heart of the Rockies and obtain the most picturesque scenes for which the American West is noted.

The Essanay's Western release for Saturday, November 12, will be noted for the strength of the story, a plot with many unusual and novel situations, for the excellence of the acting and for the beauty and wild ruggedness of the mountain scenery, which, it is claimed, rivals anything of this nature the Essanay company has recently released. The story is exciting, intensely dramatic, with situations which will hold the audience breathless.

Pinto, the bandit, so the story goes, in his rendezvous in the mountains, learns from a newspaper report that Marie Canby, the niece of Judge Canby, an Arizona millionaire, is to arrive at her uncle's ranch that day. Marie has been in the East attending school. Pinto knows that the ride from the station to the judge's ranch is through certain dangerous and wild parts of the mountains and concluding that her escort will not exceed the numbers of his own band makes plans to kidnap the girl and hold her for ransom.

Despite the protestations of his half-breed wife, Pinto and his men leave and an hour later return to the mountain rendezvous with their prisoner. The girl is frightened but self-possessed, and immediately sets about to make her escape. Pinto endeavors to make her sign a note to the judge demanding payment for her ransom but she indignantly destroys it and Pinto leaves in a rage.

Marie at last arrives at a plan by which she believes she can effect an escape. Feigning illness, she sends Pinto's wife for her captor. Pinto is deceived and realizing that the girl, dead, would be valueless to him orders his wife to ride to the village for the doctor.

The doctor is summoned and is met by Pinto and his gang. He is blindfolded and led down a rocky defile, which ends at the door of Pinto's cavern. There he is told to administer to the girl with his life as penalty if he fails to cure her. The doctor immediately sees the girl's trick and whispers reassuringly: "Have courage, I will rescue you."

Pinto, finding his patient has considerably improved after the doctor's treatment, starts a flirtation which so enrages his wife that she plans to obtain release for her. The doctor is still held a prisoner in another part of the cave, and hastening to him she hastily tells him how he can effect the girl's rescue. "Tomorrow," she tells him, "you will be released. In some way you must mark the trial down which you are led blindfolded. Then it will be an easy matter to find the way here when you come with the sheriff. I will help you."

The next morning the physician is blindfolded and led out of the cave. But in his pocket he has loaded a quantity of small pills which he carefully scatters along the winding crannies of the trail.

In the open the blind is removed and he is set free. An hour later he pulls up at the sheriff's office. After stating his business and how he has made it easy to effect the capture of Pinto and his gang, a posse is organized and sent out with the doctor as the guide.

The doctor and posse follow the pill-strewn path up the tortuous defile and easily capture the bad man. Alone, the doctor finds Marie, who expresses her deep gratefulness in a warm hand-clasp and with tears in her eyes.

MANAGERS AGAINST ORDINANCE.

Passaic Photoplay Men Claim $500 a Year License Too Much—Will Fight It.

Photoplay managers in Passaic, N. J., are highly indignant over the proposed ordinance of the common council to raise the license of photoplay theatres from $100 to $500. While the ordinance has had two readings and final action is to be taken at the next meeting of the council, the photoplay managers will do all in their power to have the proposed ordinance defeated.

In a communication, prepared by the managers of the leading photoplay theatres, they have protested against the granting of licenses to every one that comes to Passaic with the purpose of starting a photoplayhouse. The managers claim that they have long been citizens of the city and have always tried to improve the property on which their houses are situated; that they have invested heavily in order to bring up the standard of picture shows to where the public can feel sure that nothing against the morals of the city is being offered.

The managers further protest against the use of vaudeville in picture theatres, as it has been found injurious to the pictures and leaves a bad impression on the audiences, especially the children. The managers say that the cause of many photoplay theatres being so severely criticized is not from the pictures, but from the cheap vaudeville that is allowed to be run, and for that reason they protest against it.

It is claimed that the photoplay theatres of Passaic are among the safest in the country and that the managers are working in harmony with each other in order to uplift the moral tone of the entertainment. While they are willing to pay a reasonable license fee, the sum of $500 is unreasonable.

NEW BROOKLYN THEATRE OPENS.

Designed for all members of the family, Brooklyn's newest playhouse, the Oxford, at State and Flatbush avenues, opposite the Long Island Railroad station, threw open its doors Monday, Oct. 10. The Oxford is another of the many amusement enterprises provided for New York city by Mr. Percy G. Williams.

Constructed of Moorish architecture, with an imposing exterior and a comfortable auditorium, with colors blending in perfect harmony, the Oxford easily takes position among the coziest theatres in Brooklyn. There will be three performances daily, a matinee and two in the evening, at half-past seven and nine o'clock, as well as concerts Sunday afternoons and evening. The best and latest motion pictures will be shown, with vaudeville of unusual excellence for a theatre of this class.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

THE average drummer in a picture theatre is the greatest handicap a piano player has to contend with. A good drummer, one who knows how and when to play, is a necessity in every well regulated picture house, but, they are hard to find. The average drummer wants to make himself heard from the overture to the chaser, and, as a rule they are very partial to marches, and play so loud that in a short time the piano player gets the habit of following the drummer instead of leading, and the result is, the audience is treated to a big noise from the beginning to the close of the picture, and, upon leaving the theatre, the audience would not speak a good word for the best picture ever produced after being compelled to sit and listen to such music.

You have, no doubt been in just such places, where the music has grated on your nerves to such an extent that you could not get interested in the pictures, and when the good night slide was thrown on there was a sigh of relief from the entire audience. Don't blame the piano player because the drummer is no musician, it is not the piano player's fault. Drumming looks very easy, and, nine times out of ten the manager, and, being not overly fond of work, they have bought him some second hand drums and given him a job in the picture house to keep him off the streets at night, consequently, the piano player and the patrons are made to suffer.

It is just as essential that an exhibitor secures a professional drummer as well as a professional piano player, he can hire the greatest piano player in the world to play the pictures and give him an amateur drummer to work with and his music will be a failure.

The professional drummer who has the least conception of playing the pictures, will never try to play through a pathetic scene or during the showing of the average dramatic subject unless he gives a roll during some good point in the picture or at the climax. When I say a roll, I do not mean a roll on the snare, if the picture is a strong dramatic subject and the piano player has held the audience quiet up to the strongest point or the climax, how much more in keeping with the picture it is for the drummer to give a roll on the base drum, if he does not possess kettle drums.

I am a great believer in traps and effects if they are properly handled, and I can point to no better example than Lyman H. Howe. If the exhibitors would pay more attention to their music and effects they too would be receiving a dollar a ticket instead of five and ten cents. Lyman H. Howe is recognized as the greatest motion picture man in the field to-day. He can take the same pictures that you are showing for five cents and can demand a dollar a seat for the same show. There is something behind this that would be worth while for the exhibitor to look into and consider. Lyman Howe has always made the music and effects a feature of his entertainment, and it is this point that has placed him as leader in the picture business. And still the exhibitor will give souvenirs, put on cheap vaudeville and pull off voting contests to boost business instead of considering the music. They put themselves in a rut at the opening of the house by engaging a ten-dollar piano player and an eight-dollar drummer.

Piano and drums are the only instruments that can be used in playing pictures, when you add other instruments you cannot expect your musicians to make good playing pictures. I have seen the greatest bunch of fakirs in the country assembled for a picture orchestra, and the result was a failure.

There are certain pictures where a violin can be used in a pathetic scene to good advantage, but no matter how good the violinist is, they cannot change with a piano in playing pictures.

At Dodge's theatre, Keokuk, Iowa, where I am working at present, we have a violinist, one of the best in the business, and I can safely say we do not use him in more than two pictures a week. If you are showing such a picture as Edison's "The Song That Reached His Heart," a violinist can use "Annie Laurie" in certain parts of the picture to good advantage.

Then for example take such a picture as the Biograph release of October 24th, "The Message of the Violin," the violin is a necessity and the picture is not complete without one. If you have no violinist on your pay roll when you show such a picture as "The Message of the Violin" don't be afraid of spending a little money, and, engage one for the night you show the picture, you will soon notice an increase in your receipts.

There is another thing to be considered. A drummer cannot be expected to handle the entire line of effects, it is the drummer's business to handle chimes, tom toms, tambourines, castinets, wood blocks, cymbols, bells and his drums. If you wish to add railroad imitations, slap sticks, etc., they should be worked from behind the screen.

The illustrated song is, as a matter of fact, looked upon as part of the music in the picture show, and I believe it is one of the greatest drawbacks in the business to-day. The singer, as a rule, is paid on the same basis as the piano player, and what kind of a singer can you get for ten dollars a week? The singer in most places is used as a sort of fill in, and in most cases the audience would rather have a white sheet instead of the song during the changing of the reels. Then there is another side to the illustrated song question. It may be you have a very good singer, but the smut that some of the publishers are putting in their songs to make them go, is enough to drive the better class of people from your house forever. Let us say for example you have a three-reel program made up of "The Three Friends," Gaumont, "The Broken Doll," Biograph, and "The Legacy," Vitagraph, a program that would please the Saints. Then say that you have a very select audience, people who have been skeptic towards motion pictures, you have induced them to come to your theatre as you have this excellent bill on, and then your singer gets up and hands them such stuff as 'The Dance of the Grizzly Bear," "Naughty Eyes" or "The Angle Worm Wiggle." What kind of an impression do you think your audience will have of your show? You will not only lose those people as patrons, but you have lowered the efforts of the producers in trying to better the picture business.

You may say I am getting away from my story when I mention the illustrated songs, but I am not, for, that disgusted audience has left the theatre condemning everything on the inside, even the pictures and the piano player.

In my next article, I will suggest some appropriate music for recent releases of feature films.

The Photoplaywright and the Play

THE photoplay originated with the beginning of Time and is as old as the everlasting hills themselves. This is a statement that may scarcely seem just to those who had to do with contriving the modern method of producing it, but if scientists are to be believed, there are atmospheric and celestial conditions that have been minutely filming the doings of this old vale of tears since the darkness was first swept off the face of the deep, and mirages are pointed to as partial proof. Thus Time is but one mighty picture reel and Adam and Eve enacted the first photoplay for Nature's camera. Not being sufficiently well versed in the scientific end of it to go further, the writer leaves it an open question as to whether Dame Nature first created her filming apparatus or produced her subjects and afterwards thought of photographing them. At any rate, she gets her photoplayers, her editors and producers for their keep alone and her scenario writers are the gods themselves.

So much for the photoplay which is nothing new under the sun. What of the author—the mental toiler untwisting all the chains that tie the hidden soul of harmony that he may give birth to new ideas for the plot behind the photoplay? Will his future be more hopeful because a new name has been invented for the picture story? So far there is no writing on the wall to that effect. Fame for him ends with the editor who reviews his work, nor is there a prospect of his getting a flyer at the bauble reputation even at the camera's mouth. Like the fabled ass in Hades condemned to munch unceasingly at the endless rope of hay, he sees nothing ahead but drudgery shaping and developing his product for no other reward than the very occasional cheque. Does not his work demand peculiar talent? And if so, why should he not receive due credit like others in the game of letters?

Brilliant story-book authors have entered the picture arena with a great blare of trumpets and proved signal failures as creators of the silent drama. Yet the names of these are flaunted with the title on the screen often introducing a tiresome reel; while the unknown writer who produced the script for the more virile picture that follows must remain submerged, unhonored and unsung all because he did not indite a "best seller" before he took a crack at the pictures. Some of us could not even write a "worst seller" were it to save us from the torments to come, but photoeditors have admitted that masterpieces in photowriting have been and are still being produced by obscure individuals. Why not let the photoplaywright have his little bid for reputation? It would cost the manufacturer nothing to give credit where credit is due and it would mean worlds to the playwright.

Unlike the writer for printed fiction, the writer of the photo story must rely on creative ability alone, and he has no opportunity to gloss over defects of plot with pretty sections of Webster's Unabridged. He must send forth his story naked as it was brain born, leaving the

By James S McQuade

OMINOUS rumblings are heard in the "independent" camp these days and that something in the nature of an upheaval is to take place at the Cleveland meeting of the N. I. M. P. A., Friday and Saturday, Oct. 28 and 29, is pretty well assured. The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Campany is to be placed on the grill, on numerous counts, and at the present writing it looks as if it will be burned to a crisp.

The N. I. M. P. A. sides with the Associated "Independent" Manufacturers in their contention with the Sales Company, and, although no manufacturers will be permitted to attend the Convention at the Holland House, it can be stated pretty confidently that the Associated Manufacturers will not suffer thereby.

It was whispered to me the other day that the high handed methods of the Sales Company reached a climax recently, when a demand was made by it on the American Film Manufacturing Company of this city to pay a bonus of $5,000 cash and a royalty of 2 cents a foot on all films sold through the Sales Company. It is understood that this attempted extortion will be one of the questions to be considered and passed on at the coming meeting of the N. I. M. P. A. That $5,000 cash bonus for the right to transact business through the Sales Company is a financial comedy that can be smiled at by all except the selected victim. For some time past I have heard it said that the Sales Company has been in a bad way, with some of its members in dire financial straits. What is more natural, therefore, than that they should try and help themselves, when the opportunity offered? Such examples of brotherly love and harmony should delight "independent" exhibitors who are always eager to swallow as gospel the numerous lying slanders against the licensed interests, circulated by members of the Sales Company.

The following extracts from the circular recently sent out by the N. I. M. P. A. to "independent" exchanges, in connection with the Cleveland meeting, will be worth the perusal of Film Index readers:

"Every member will be given an opportunity to state his grievances, so that members in a body can discuss them, pro and con, and then act accordingly.

"No manufacturer will be invited to attend or have any voice in our meeting.

"You will see an original ten-page agreement entered into by and between the national Independent Moving Picture Alliance and the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Co., which has been unreasonably violated by the Sales Co. You will also see other important letters of the Sales Company. You will see the original ten-page agreement between the Associated Independent Film Manufacturers and the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company of the Alliance. This had been violated by the Sales Company at the time the peace settlement was declared during the fight between the manufacturers. This agreement was entered into and signed, and never lived up to. Therefore, the Associated Manufacturers declare unless this agreement is lived up to they will abide by the decision of the Alliance members. These original agreements will be on exhibition.

"The Associated Manufacturers have stuck to the Alliance in a straight-forward and aboveboard manner.

"The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company agreed to protect Alliance members where territories were properly represented with Independent film. This they did not do, but sold anybody regardless of consequences, excepting that where a member of the Sales Company was represented, such territory was protected.

"Do you expect to run your own exchange in the future? If you do, membership in the Alliance is the only course left to place you in a position to demand your rights.

"Many members will be present with information that will startle you.

"Pay no attention to letters you receive from manufacturers. They might try to mislead you as they did during our other meetings."

The Dark M. P. Theatre Disappearing.

Even away out in Durango, Colo., the dark auditorium is disappearing in picture theatres, although in that community light in such houses is not essential for the close observance of good morals. They have another and effective way out there to take care of the theatre degenerate, in case one makes his appearance, and it means short shrift and quick punishment.

I am obliged to James M. Probst, manager of the Isis theatre, Durango, for the following letter:

"In response to your request for the names of out of town exhibitors presenting pictures in a lighted auditorium, I submit the one below.

"We installed the Simpson Screen something over a month ago, since which time our house has been lighted without any detriment to the pictures.

"Our patrons like the change very much, owing to the ease in finding seats and to the reduced strain on the eyes."

Library of Film Subjects for Schools.

Good news, showing the growing importance and usefulness of moving pictures, has recently reached us from California. This is no less than the proposed formation of a library of film subjects for use in the school departments of San Francisco, Oakland and Berkeley.

The enterprising gentlemen engaged in this worthy object would be greatly assisted and encouraged by corresponding with Mr. George Kleine, President of the Kleine Optical Co., 52 State Street, this city, who has devoted many years to the gathering of the largest and most complete collection of educational films in the world. His great catalogue of these films should be in the hands of every progressive instructor. In it, travelogue, scenic, scientific and industrial subjects are listed by the hundreds, each one of them being of the highest and most absorbing educational type.

It is only a question of brief time when our public schools, private schools and colleges, and even great universities will each be equipped with a well selected film library.

Cubs-Athletics Film Released Oct. 28.

I have just learned that the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co. will release a full length reel of the National-American series of games, between the Cubs and Athletics, on Friday, Oct. 28, the day of going to press for The Film Index. By the time this issue is in the hands of readers, hundreds of thousands of delighted baseball enthusiasts will have lived over again the scenes of the memorable contest, in which the Cubs went down to defeat.

The demand for this film has been unprecedented, for one in its particular line, and the number of prints required to meet it will make a new record. I am told that every foot of the film has its especial thrill and that the photography is excellent.

Plea for the Fight Pictures.

In a recent issue of the Ann Arbor News, the editor of that paper took some of his readers to task for the hub-bub raised over the presentation of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures, in that city. Extracts from the editorial are given herewith, others being omitted owing to the irrelevancy of the matter to the question at issue:

"A number of good people in this city are worrying themselves sick over the presentation at a local theatre of the motion pictures showing the scenes incidental to and the Jeffries-Johnson fight itself. These people have an idea that it will be bad for the morals of the community if these pictures are allowed to be shown here. If they were not so much in earnest their protest would be an amusing thing.

"The trouble with the great majority of reformers is that they try to reform something about which they know nothing. Two men physically capable can do little lasting harm to each other in the prize ring. A scratch or two, a discolored eye, occasionally a broken hand or some other minor injury is the usual penalty.

"A mother who would hold up her hands in holy horror at the idea of her son entering the prize ring will calmly sit on the sidelines during a football game and see her son take more punishment in five minutes of football than he woud receive in a ten-round fight and think nothing of it. Men are occasionally killed in the prize ring, but in nine cases out of ten the man who meets his death there is not physically fit. He is the victim of a bad heart or a run-down constitution due to dissipation. Cases where a pugilist who is physically fit meeting with a fatal accident are very rare.

"But in a football game the most physically capable man stands just as good a chance of meeting with fatal injuries as one who is not so perfect physically. But football is with us to stay.

"We can see no more reason why the exhibition of pictures of a fight would harm the morals of the community than would the pictures of any of the big football games which are played in this country."

Magnificent Special Release by Selig.

I have just been advised that the Selig Polyscope Co. will have as a special release for Tuesday, Nov. 1, the "Mexican Centennial Celebration," which for picturesque display, scenic beauty and photographic clearness is considered by Mr. Wm. N. Selig one of the firm's finest efforts. Apart from the foregoing merits, this film subject can be strongly recommended for its educational worth.

The first scene shows the arrival of state dignitaries and ambassadors at the grand stand, which is followed by the arrival and reception of President Diaz. Afterwards is seen the unveiling of the Humboldt monument, presented to the Mexican government by the German Emperor; next an imposing parade representing Mexican commercial interests, which is immediately followed by marine maneuvers and a grand march in which the Mexican Rurales figure prominently. These are succeeded by a magnificent and beautiful flower parade, after which are seen various Mexican fire departments, with complete fire-fighting paraphernalia. The spectator next witnesses the stately ceremonies attending the laying of the corner stone of the Garibaldi monument by President Diaz, and the film presents in the closing scenes a historic parade at Toluca, in which Mexican regiments, foreign diplomats and other dignitaries participate.

The entire film is marked by a wealth of the display and pomp which are dear to the hearts of the subjects of the sister Republic on our southern boundary, and will well repay all who view it.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg.
All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 9.—Large alternating current generators are usually made with a number of rotating magnet poles, alternately of north and south pole magnetism.

On account of the difficulty of securing a permanent magnet of large size and also on account of the impossibility of regulating the strength of the magnetism from a permanent magnet, the pole pieces of an alternating current generator are usually magnetised by copper coils, through which direct current flows.

The magnet poles of an alternating current generator, have to be supplied with direct current, which is usually furnished by a very small direct current dynamo or generator, which is provided with its own field rheostat by means of which the attendant in the power house can increase or decrease the voltage of the small generator or "exciter," thereby increasing or decreasing the current flowing in the magnet coils on the magnet poles of the larger alternator, which in turn increases or decreases the voltage of the alternating current delivered by the alternating current gnerator.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" NO. 10.

The Transformer for Alternating Current.

The electric transformer is a device for producing a current of different quantity and potential than the supply current. In alternating current lighting or power systems, the transformer reduces the primary line voltage to a lower voltage suitable for the interior of buildings, in which case, it is called a "step-down" transformer. In some instances it is desirable when transmitting electric energy, to generate the current at a low voltage, then for long distances where high voltage is required on the line wire, a transformer is introduced between the generator and the line wires for increasing the line voltage, in which case it is called a "step-up" transformer.

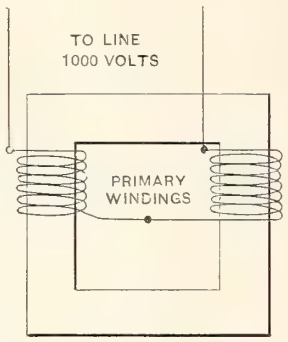

Fig. 17

For general requirements however, we need only consider the step-down transformer, which consists of several parts, which are diagrammatically illustrated in figures 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19.

There are several types of transformers, some intended to reduce from one voltage to another maintaining the voltage delivered as nearly constant as possible, irrespective of the load. This type of transformer is called "constant potential."

For other purposes transformers are required to reduce a given line voltage to a steady flow of amperes as may be required for a motion picture arc lamp or for operating arc lamps in series, as is usually done for street lighting, and this kind of transformer is said to be of the "constant current" type, because it maintains a steady ampere flow on the circuit which supplies the arc lamp, or in case of street lighting several arc lamps in series. For the present, we will only consider the step-down constant potential transformer, and referring to figure 15, the illustration gives a top view of the core, and figure 16 gives an end view of the core.

The core of an alternating current transformer is made up of sheets of annealed iron, or specially prepared electrical steel. The sheets must be very thin; not more than 1-64 of an inch thick. The best transformers use sheets not over 1-100 of an inch thick. In constructing the core it is also necessary to provide a thin layer of insulation between every sheet of iron, and this is usually accomplished by painting one side of the iron with some insulating compound. These sheets of iron are usually called "laminations," and a core made up from such sheets is called "laminated core." After the sheets have been stacked on top of each other to the desired thickness, which is determined by the size of the transformer, they are insulated by fiber, press board and mica, so that the copper coils may be placed around the core legs without any danger of touching the iron.

Figure 17 illustrates the core, with the primary or high voltage winding in place. This winding is generally composed of a comparatively great number of turns, of small insulated copper wire in the shape of coils surrounding the core legs. For argument sake, we might assume that this transformer has 1,000 turns of copper wire for the primary winding and that the line voltage is 1,000.

Referring to figure 18, you see the secondary winding of this same transformer mounted on the core legs. This winding is composed of comparatively few turns of larger insulated copper wire, and we may assume in this instance the two secondary coils are composed of 100 turns, which if connected to the load will deliver about 100 volts.

with laminated core, primary and secondary windings in place, making a complete transformer wound for 1,000 volt primary, and 100 volt secondary to be used as a "step-down" transformer.

This same transformer illustrated in Figure 19, can be used as a "step-up" transformer by connecting the 100 volt line to its secondary 100 volt windings, in which case they become primary and this transformer will deliver on its secondary 1,000 volts, so that you can see that the same transformer can be used for "step-up" or "step-down" work.

The operation of the transformer is as follows: When the alternating current passes through the primary winding it produces magnetism in the iron core, which is reversed 60 times per second on a 60-cycle circuit. This magnetism, in turn, induces electric current in the secondary windings and the voltage of this current will depend upon the number of turns of wire on the core. I have illustrated how the primary is wound with 1,000 turns of wire for 1,000 volts, and the secondary with 100 turns of wire for 100 volts. It is evident that this ratio which, in the above case, is 10 to 1, can be changed to any desired amount by putting more or less turns of wire on the primary and secondary coils.

The transformer, for alternating current, is a most efficient and useful device. In fact, it has made the alternating current of great value, because it permits generating and transmitting high voltage currents of great power at low amperage over small wires to be reduced efficiently and with safety to low voltage currents and great power of higher amperage as is required for lighting, power and heat.

Summary.

The transformer when reducing a high voltage is called "step-down" transformer; when increasing the voltage, it is called "step-up" transformer.

The transformer has 3 distinct parts: The laminated iron core, the primary winding and the secondary winding.

The number of turns of the primary and secondary windings determine the ratio of transformation.

In the next "Electrical Talk" we will further discuss the alternating current transformer.

D. F. MACK'S NEW HOUSE.

D. F. Mack will open a first-class photoplay theatre in the Humphries building, Poultney, Vt., within the next two weeks. The house will be fully equipped with the modern appliances used in photoplay houses, and besides will be one of the finest decorated theatres in the "Green Mountain" state.

The interior will be decorated in a light green tint in order to soften the light on the picture curtain. All the lights will be diffused and the house during the time pictures are being shown will be light enough to distinguish persons on the opposite side of the room.

A new machine will be installed in a fireproof booth, and only the latest of licensed pictures will be used. Mr. Mack's entertainment will be strictly high class and no pictures that will cause any comment will be allowed to be shown. The other feature of the entertainment will be the illustrated songs. A first class singer has been engaged to do the singing.

EMPIRE BEING IMPROVED.

Extensive improvements have been completed at the Empire Theatre, 739 Penn street, Reading, Pa. Improved cork matting was laid in the aisles, so as to deaden sound. A fine curtain of metalized surface installed recently shows pictures much clearer than before. The front of the building has been decorated and makes a good showing. The theatre is doing a big business, showing good gains since the arrival of cooler evenings.

GEM THEATRE OPENS.

Cairo, Illinois, New Photoplay Theatre Meets with Great Success

In a blaze of 500 electric lights and with the music of an excellent orchestra the beautiful little "Gem" theatre, Cairo, Ill., was opened to the public Oct. 10, and the first performance given which was witnessed at the two shows by nearly 1,500 people.

Mrs. Ruth King, daughter of Capt. George Clark sold tickets in the pretty marble lined ticket box. Dennis D. Callaghan took the tickets at the entrance, Lloyd Fahr and Bernard Cooke ushered the patrons to their seats, Harry F. Houston, the electrician, was the operator who handled the motion picture apparatus, and the proprietors, A. Botto and Alf. Meyers, were in the receiving line, with beaming faces welcoming the hundreds of people who crowded into the theatre.

The building of the theatre was begun four months ago. It is a model little playhouse built on approved lines, and every convenience and accessory has been provided for the comfort of patrons. No expense has been spared to give the Cairo people the best photoplay theatre in this part of the state.

The facade of the Gem is the most attractive of any building in Cairo. It is constructed for the most part of ornamental plastic material studded with hundreds of electric lights. The vestibule or lobby is also constructed overhead of the same material. The wainscoating is of marble and the floor tersellated. The floor of the theatre proper is of cement built with an incline towards the stage of three feet.

There are 500 opera chairs on the main floor and room for a hundred or more in the gallery over the entrance.

The protection against first has been carefully looked after. A heavy asbestos curtain screens the scenery. A 2½ inch fire hose is kept attached to a water pipe at the side of the stage. There are four exits in the building. Over each one is the word "Exit" in bright red. The most completely fireproof operator's room is situated directly over the entrance where the motion pictures are projected. It is absolutely impossible for a film to burn and do any damage or cause any uneasiness to the occupants of the theatre.

The stage is well lighted. In fact the electric lighting of the entire theatre both outside and inside is exceptional and worthy of note. It required nearly 15,000 feet of copper wire to complete the work.

One of the most beautiful floral pieces ever seen in Cairo was presented to Managers Botto and Meyers, at the opening. It was a frame of thousands of flowers, about 4 by 6 feet, consisting of roses, carnations, etc., in the center of which were the words "Welcome to Gem." This beautiful frame was placed upon the stage on an easel so all could see it.

The attraction of the opening night (and will be for Tuesday and Wednesday) was the Cora Carson Sextette, a bevy of young girls who sang, danced and did musical turns. They were warmly welcomed by the audience. Three reels of the best grade of motion pictures were shown.

A feature of the Gem is the orchestra which is composed of the following: Prof. H. Lemcke, Sr., pianist and director; W. Wilson, violinist, H. Lemcke, Jr., cornet and A. Till drummer.

The opening of the Gem was a great success in every way and the people of Cairo will no doubt show their appreciation in the way of patronage, if they are given good programs.

DEFENDS NICKEL THEATRES.

In a talk given before the Drama league, Milwaukee, Wis., Oct. 14, Rev. H. H. Jacobs, Milwaukee, Wis., said that five-cent theatres brought less immorality before audiences than many of the so-called high class plays of the larger theatres. He contended that the nickel theater was a boon to the community by supplying good entertainment at a low cost. E. J. Ward spoke on the possibility of the drama in the extension of the playground system. He said that much could be done for the children, both as to morals and education, by the occasional presentation of small plays. Miss Zona Gale, Portage, spoke in favor of school plays for class entertainments.

PHOTOPLAY HOUSE FOR CRESTON, IA.

On Saturday night, October 17, Messrs. Lloyd & Hopper threw open the doors of their new photoplay theatre, on West Montgomery street, Creston, Ia. Long before the time for the doors to open, large crowds of anxious spectators gathered in front of the box office, waiting to purchase the first tickets, and the four performances that took place attracted capacity houses.

At the last performance, the crowd was so large that it was impossible for all to get in the theatre, and the management threw open all doors in order that those on the street and in the lobby could see the pictures from the outside. The pictures were the latest that could be obtained from the licensed manufacturers and more than pleased all who saw them.

SETTING SHUTTER.

NEW YORK CITY writes: I have been working on a Power's No. 6 for the past nine weeks and never had no trouble until one day last week. My arm happened to hit the shutter and my picture started to flicker and I did not know how to time it. Will you kindly let me know how I could time it without a flicker?

The timing (or setting) of the shutter on a Power's No. 6 is very easy after once done. You unloosen the set screw on the inside collar and set the wide wing (or blade) so that the top will show about one-half of the light just as your intermittent sprocket is about to move. Then tighten the set screw on the inside collar, also see that set screw on the outer collar is tight to the spindle in groove. This will remedy your difficulties.

BROOKLYN writes: We notice here of late, since the installing of — machine, that our pictures are not as clear on one side as they were before the installing of the above machine. Can you help us out?

You will find that on the above machine the set collar that the lens is attached to is held on the mechanism by three set screws and if any of these set screws should be tightened more than the other it will throw your lens out and in that way give you a blurred picture on one side. It is not necessary to tighten these screws up like locking a safe; just put enough force on them to hold the set collar in position. I think this will remedy it. If not, will be pleased to hear from you further.

MADISON, N. J., writes: (1) I am using and find that the belt is too short for the magazine.

(2) How can I tell which one of the condensers is 6 1-2-in. focus or 7 1-2-in. focus? The directions say the 6 1-2 goes nearest to the light. One of them is thick and the other is thin.

(3) Also, when I put the condensers in the case they don't fit the case as the case is too large.

(1) On the style of machine you are using the magazine is supposed to be in front and if you just change the position of the magazine from under the table to the front of the machine you will find that your belt will be long enough.

(2) Hold the condenser lens with the flat side up to a piece of white paper pinned to the wall (and move it in and out) being sure to hold it direct with the paper until the image on the window is sharp and distinct on the paper, then measure from the paper to the flat side of the condenser, (this will give you the focus of the condenser). The thick one is 6 ½-in. focus and the thin one is 7 ½-in. focus.

(3) The condenser cell (or case) of that particular make of machine has two clips that the condensers rest upon. You will find that if you put one on each side (between the condensers), you will have no more trouble. It may be possible that you put the FLAT SIDE of the condensers together and if such is the case it is ENTIRELY WRONG as the FLAT SIDE of one condenser is to go towards the light and the FLAT SIDE of the other condenser is to go towards the screen. I am quite sure that if you follow these instructions you will have no more trouble.

BERMUDA writes—We spent two hours last night trying out our machine but cannot get any results. In the first place the picture shows up too small and very indistinct. I think our 40-ft. lens is to blame for this. I moved the picture cloth as far back as possible but still the picture is not large enough nor distinct. My operator thinks we are too close for the lens. Can you help us out?

You do not say what size picture you are getting with the lens at 40 ft. but taking it for granted you are using the regulation size lens that goes with a machine when purchased from a Film Exchange, I should say your picture is about 7 ½x10 ft. at 40 ft. and if you put your screen (or cloth) back farther, that is, from the machine, you will then get a larger picture. As far as your picture being indistinct, it might be that your condensers are dirty or your lens. LOOK THEM OVER and CLEAN THEM at least three times a week and it will help wonderfully. Some operators clean them every day, after cleaning the condensers you will be surprised at the results obtained. Or perhaps a slight turn of the pinion on the rachet on the lens will bring it into focus. The lens you are now using will not give you a larger picture at 40 ft. The only way you can get a larger picture with that lens is for you to move the machine farther back from the screen or the screen farther back from the machine. What you want, if you cannot move the machine or screen, is a lens that will give you a larger picture at 40 ft. Perhaps your screen (or cloth) is too thin. If so, you would lose a great deal of the light and in this case I would suggest you putting a black cloth in back of the screen and in this way you will get the benefit of all the light thrown on the screen. Try this and you will be surprised at the results. Would like to hear further from you.

In last week's columns I gave you a brief review of the leading principles of Projection for slides and moving pictures and promised that I would this week give a table showing the size of image obtained with lenses of different focal lengths at various distances. I submit the following table:

WALTER H. FOSTER TO RUN NEW HOUSE.

Walter H. Foster, who has been engaged in the motion picture business in Somerworth, N. H., for quite a number of years, first on Market street, this city, and then in Dover and Rochester, has been secured by V. G. Lamb, to run his new theatre "The Colonial" in his new block on Washington street. The theatre is one of the prettiest little playhouses in this section, and Mr. Foster plans to run vaudeville as well as motion pictures. The house has 288 chairs and on Monday the opening night the full capacity of 325 was taken and many could not gain admittance. Mr. Foster plans to run exhibitions each afternoon from 3 to 5 o'clock and evenings from 7 to 10.

REAL IRISH-AMERICAN PICTURES

Kalem Company Makes a Successful Foray into the Emerald Isle—Some German Pictures Too.

Announcement by the Kalem Company that it will soon release a series of pictures taken by its own stock company in Ireland, England, and Germany, is likely to create no little comment in motion picture circles. American picture makers have, at different times, gone far afield for novelties and scenic effects, but it looks as though this effort on the part of the Kalem Company had eclipsed anything yet attempted and, from what the representative of The Film Index has seen of the result of the trip, the pictures obtained will be of more than passing interest.

The company in charge of Mr. Sidney Olcott, producer, Miss Gene Gautier, assistant, and Mr. George Hollister, camera man, sailed from New York, Saturday, August 6, on the White Star liner Baltic. The party arrived at Queenstown, Ireland, August 13, and at once set out to get a series of Irish scenes. A number of scenarios had been prepared in advance and no time was lost, except that which was occasioned by adverse weather conditions.

Among the points visited in Ireland were Queenstown, Cork, the Lakes of Killarney, and Dublin. From Ireland the party went to London, Berlin, Raddusch, Elberfield, (Ger.), Antwerp, and Paris, returning home October 6th after covering a distance of about 10,000 miles.

Everywhere the picture makers were received with open arms and every courtesy was shown them. There was no lack of assistance from the natives at every point visited, as the pictures show.

The novelty of this enterprising effort on the part of the Kalem Company cannot fail to meet a response from the exhibitors of the country. It will afford them a splendid opportunity for advertising and when the pictures are shown all records of attendance will be in danger of serious fractures.

A feature of these pictures, and one which is carried through each subject, is the linking together of the old and the new world. In each picture the scenes shift to and from America and Ireland or the Continent, and is the first instance in the making of the photoplay in which anything of this character has been attempted. It should be remembered that these pictures will not be scenic subjects, but will be story pictures giving glimpses of out of the way places and phases of real life at home and abroad.

The first release is entitled "The Irish Lad's Return," and is scheduled for Wednesday, November 23, 1910.

TAKING PICTURES IN IRELAND.
Kalem Director Olcott and Miss Gauntier at Cabin Used in the Picture "The Irish Lad's Return."

DENVER TO HAVE $125,000 NICKEL HOUSE.

One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars has been invested in a 5-cent theatre in Denver—the Princess, on Curtis street—and the new place was opened Oct. 10, 15,000 persons passing through the doors the first day. These figures of attendance are the more remarkable in view of the fact that the only attraction was music by an orchestra composed solely of women, with Antonio Biehle as leader. There are ten players.

The theatre has seating capacity of 1,000 and the chairs are as comfortable as were ever installed in any public place in Denver. The theatre is well ventilated, mechanical devices causing a complete change of air every minute. Another inviting feature is that there is not a post in the place, the balcony being of the steel suspension kind.

Five cents is to be the charge for admission at all times. Motion pictures of high class will be shown, with instrumental and vocal accompaniments, the first of the views to be presented Tuesday at noon. All the pictures for the Princess will be exclusive in Denver.

KALEM STOCK COMPANY GOES SOUTH.

The regular annual migration of the Kalem players to Florida occurred last week. Director Olcott, as advance man, departed the week before to secure accommodations for the company, which consists of seventeen people this year—a considerable increase in number over those which have gone South in previous years. The company will have increased facilities for its work this year and some unusual pictures are looked for.

BOY CITY

A Novel Special Film, By Selig

JAS. S. McQUADE

BOUNDLESS is the great domain, and broad as the activities of man is the mission, of the motion picture! Every day witnesses the encroachment of the camera on new fields, where it serves, as no other aid could, to bring vividly before millions of people the upward progress of the race to higher planes of thought and living. A mighty preacher, the motion picture embodies the eloquence of a thousand gifted tongues; a great teacher, it imparts the concentrated wisdom of the past and makes us eager for the revelations of the future.

I have been enthused to write the foregoing paragraph by seeing the other day a special film by the Selig Company, a film that is not only novel in subject, but also one that makes a peculiarly powerful appeal to the thinking man and woman. The ordinary picture theatre goer may see this film run off and yet miss the heart-grip of the subject that lies behind the scenes. And he or she may go away and even think that the film is commonplace, whereas it gives in picture form some of the beneficent results of a philanthropic movement that means immeasurable good to the future citizenship of our common country.

A boy city! Did you ever see one? That is, a city that is wholly run by boys—a boy mayor, boy members of the Council, boy bankers and business boys of all kinds (we can't call them business men), boy editors and reporters, a boy postmaster, policeboys, boy voters, etc., etc. That is just what the Selig special release, "Boy City," will show you. And the pictures depict this boy community in the discharge of many of their daily duties, from sunrise until curfew rings. But more about this later.

On this page you will notice the portrait of Judge Willis Brown, the "King of Kids," as he has been aptly rechristened by his admirers. Judge Brown is responsible for the existence of any such community as a boy city. He has made the study of boy character and its betterment his life work. He is the author of the Utah Juvenile Court laws and founder of the system in that State; the first and former judge of the Salt Lake City Juvenile Court and President of the National Juvenile Betterment Association and founder of three boy cities.

The Boy City filmed by the Selig special release is that near Charlevoix, Mich., picturesquely situated on Pine Lake, within gun shot of Lake Michigan.

Here is what the Salt Lake "Herald" writes of Judge Willis Brown and his work:

"When Judge Brown came here, children were being arraigned for petty offenses in the same dock with hardened criminals. There was a cell in the filthy city jail marked 'for juveniles.' Boys and girls were sent indiscriminately to the reform school and branded for life as unfit for good association when they were not essentially wicked or vicious; the per cent. of the saved was infinitesimal, the permanently damned was awful. This was the situation when Judge Brown came and began his talks to the boys, and it takes no long memory to recall how the boys rallied to his support, nor does it take any acute observation to discover that the cigarette evil has been almost entirely abolished among the boys of the community. There have been no more cases where boys have been imprisoned with hardened criminals. The man who used to sell cigarettes or liquor to boys has found it unprofitable as well as dangerous; instead of regarding the law and courts with terror the wayward youngsters have learned to know the judge as a refuge when they are tempted, a friend when they are in trouble, and to recognize their own obligation to observe the law and enforce it. Waiving any question of moral values, the Juvenile Court has been the best investment the city or state has ever made, and the returns are due to the judge who has managed it. Every principal in the public schools has declared the value of the court under Judge Brown's administration. Every man, woman and child who has had occasion to see the workings of the court, knows it is a powerful agency for the moral uplift of childhood of the whole community."

Judge Brown came East to engage in his life work on a larger scale, his aim being to make it national. His present home is in Charlevoix, Mich., and every year, from July 15 until Sept. 1, Boy City is conducted by boy citizens under his watchful eye, aided by a manager and assistant director.

These boys come from all parts of the country. Some of them are incorrigibles who have been sent to him for the administering of the famous "boy cure"; most of them are boys, just like any normal boy, whose parents wish them brought under the influence of Judge Brown's system. Boys from 11 to 17 years of age are received at Boy City. They have a boy's church, entertainments every day and evening, athletic sports and contests, political parties, and, once in a while, a circus of their own, as the pictures will show.

The motto of Boy City is: "We play the game square." As soon as a cheat is discovered, he is deprived of his citizenship and run out of the city. And now for the pictures.

Wm. N. Selig heard of Boy City, and the subject had such an interest for him that he got into communication with Judge Brown on the matter of producing a picture that would show the boys in the rounds of their daily activities. As the result, a Selig camera squad, in charge of a producer, took the steamer for Boy City last summer and the first scene in the film shows Boy City as they approach it by water. The next shows a meeting of the boy council and the Selig representative, the latter making application for permission to film the town. After a brief consideration of the request, a permit is granted.

Next we see Boy City asleep. It is a tented city, as everyone will observe, and, as it is "rising" time, the bugler makes his rounds and awakes both sleepers and echoes in the woods. Then we witness a merry scene, as the boys emerge from their miniature tents and engage in a series of individual pillow fights. But discipline is soon enforced and off the crowd of boys hike to take a morning plunge in Pine Lake. Afterwards we see the youngsters heartily devouring breakfast under a canvas top, following which we view them eagerly listening to the usual morning speech by Judge Brown.

The camera man, for the greater part of the time the speech lasts, confines his aim exclusively to the features of the judge, with the result that we can easily understand his power and influence with boys, by watching the play of emotions on his face and in his eyes. A truly inspiring face is that of Judge Brown when lit up by enthusiasm and great earnestness.

Then comes dinner and after that the election of a new mayor, the boys standing in groups conversing with vigor, or depositing their ballots. The votes are counted; the winner is declared. and the event is celebrated in speeches and by a huge bonfire. As the new mayor is closing his speech, we notice that every eye is turned in a certain direction. Then Judge Brown steps into the camera's field and is seen shaking hands heartily with the new official.

Finally the pictures take us to the circus, a circus in which the performers are all citizens of Boy City. We catch sight of a zebra and a monkey of the real kind, then a fake elephant and other made-up specimens of the lion and tiger kind, all as amusing as young spirits and joyous life can make them. Nor do we miss the side show, for there we find the skeleton man and woman, the snake charmer, the fat woman and all the other monstrosities indigenous to that department of the tented show.

And, I nearly forgot, the Boy City band loomed up, proud in numbers and in striking uniforms, at the Big Show. One can almost hear the music, with such vim and force do the members play.

The date of release of "Boy City" will be announced shortly.

"SETTLED OUT OF COURT."—"Jealousy is the spice of life," so they say, and yet how very often does it not make life too spicy. At a reception given in the residence of the Van Cleves, in honor of their son Willie, a musical genius, Mrs. Van Cleve surprises her husband in a tete-a-tete with a pretty woman, and at once she looks upon this as a serious matter. In order to find solace for her wounded affections, she proceeds to amuse herself with a prepossessing gentleman, much to the chagrin of Mr. Van Cleve.

After the departure of the guests, there is a debate between the parents and each one too certain of having been wronged, is unwilling to attempt reconciliation. A trip to Reno to secure a divorce is the outcome of the interview.

Willie is left with his grandmother, and having learned the cause of the sudden departure of his parents, he determines to join them at Reno. But where get the money, his grandmother having refused to aid him? Willie takes to playing on the street, whereby he earns enough to at least take him part ways to Reno. Off he travels, until his funds are exhausted, and then he is put off the train in a Western town. Here he again becomes popular by his fine musical talents and collects enough money to continue his journey.

Hungry and tired, he at last reaches Reno, and while playing on the street, attracts the attention of none other than his father, who recognizes the familiar sounds. But not he alone stops to listen. Also the mother comes to the side of her son and—meets face to face with her husband. The pleading of the boy "Let's go home," finds its way to the hearts of the parents and all are happy at the reunion.

This picture story should find its way into the hearts of many and thus many times avoid the pathetic expression of "what might have been."

"THE EARLY SETTLERS."—Hiram Brown and his famiy decide to emigrate to the West and cast their lot in the then almost uninhabitated country known as Minnesota, leaving their improvised home on the Ohio River. They started on their long journey in old-fashioned covered wagons. Two months later they reach the Mississippi River; being in the early fall the water was low and easily forded upon their landing. They camp for the night.

Indians, not relishing the invasion of the pale face, watch them under cover of darkness. The Indian village near by gives the family warning to move on, but this the sturdy farmer refuses to do and is seen cultivating with his team of oxen. An Indian girl (a spy) under the guise of selling Indian wares, is admitted to the camp; gaining the information she sought, reports quickly to her tribesmen, who resolve upon decisive action at once.

In the meantime Spotted Eagle has formed an attachment for one of Brown's daughters. A plan of complete capture of the family is arranged and carried out with all the cunning and fearlessness that characterized the American Indian of that period. They take their captives to the village, where they are tied to the stake. A trapper, taking his life in his hands, runs the gauntlet, mounts a running horse and hurls the Indian to the ground (a sensational scene in the extreme).

The young girl who had previously warned the camp of Indian uprising, is seen making her way to the military post to report the capture. When the soldiers reach the Brown camp they find the lone settler that had made good his escape on the Indian's horse and who guided them to the village, where a spectacular rescue of the prisoners is effected and again reunited, completing a picture of daring and sensational features seldom witnessed in film.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"TWO LITTLE WAIFS."—There is nothing worldly that makes a stronger appeal to the human heart than the grief of the little child. Children are so seldom made to feel the weight of woe, that when they do suffer real sorrows we are sure to weep with them. One of the most important of God's lessons is taught by the child—sincerity, and the child's tears will wash from our soul the stain of indifference, selfishness and artifice. The child is the real sunshine of life, and when Mrs. Weston lost her only little one, she, though a widowed mother, experienced her greatest grief. Her future seemed destined to be clothed in gloom. Her heart almost breaks as she views the empty crib in which her departed little girl formerly slumbered. About this time there are brought to a neighboring Orphan Asylum two little girls whose mother has died and left them dependent. The poor little tots cry incessantly for their mamma, but the good sisters tell them that their mamma has gone to Heaven and is now at God's house. They then cry that they want to go to mamma, indicating that they will surely go. The next day during recreation hour on the Asylum grounds, they take advantage of the excitement attending a quarrel between two of the children, and slip out through the gate. Once outside, they start off to find mamma in Heaven, asking passersby, "Which way is Heaven." After a long and tiresome journey, they come to the mansion of Mrs. Weston, which is a veritable paradise. Its grandeur convinces them that they have at last reached the goal. Through the broad flower-lined avenues the little ones wander until they come upon Mrs. Weston seated on one of the verandas. Approaching her they ask: "Please, mam, is this Heaven, and is our mamma here"? Mrs. Weston, of course, does not understand their query at first, but it suddenly dawns upon her when she sees them clasp each other weeping. Also, their asylum garb indicates where they came from, and what they are—waifs. It being late in the afternoon, she decides to keep them overnight at her home, placing them in the empty crib. The sight of these two little darlings sleeping in the little crib dispels the gloom that has enveloped her and she makes up her mind never to part with them, hence she writes to the Asylum the following letter: Dear Mother Ignatius: The two little waifs that came to me I have decided to adopt legally, and take this opportunity to bestow a regular endowment in the support of your great charity as a memorial to my lost child. Sincerely your, Helen E. Weston.

"WAITER NO. 5."—"For ye have the poor always with you." Matt. 26, ii. Because of this we are reminded of the Corporal Works of Mercy—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, harbor the harborless—which acts always bring reward. Still there may be occasions when that reward comes tardily, but there is logical reason for the delay, for in the end our reward is more complete. The wife of the Russian Chief of Police being a woman possessed of a noble heart is much touched by the tales carried to her of the tyrannical oppression bestowed upon the poor. After some persuasion on the part of a Russian artist socialist, she makes a round among the poor of the city and the sight that greets her almost freezes the blood in her veins. She sees them huddled like cattle, more dead than alive, slowly but surely dying for want of nourishment. So moved is she with the truth, that she becomes an ardent sympathizer and consents to become a member of the secret society to oppose the government in its present treatment of the poor. The meetings of this society are held in the artist's studio, a fact the police have long suspected. On the night of the admission of the wife as a member, a raid is planned by the police, and you can imagine the Chief's amazement as he enters to find his wife just taking the oath of allegiance. What a shock. At first he is at a loss to know what best to do. Finally dismissing his men with their captives, he, alone, with her, asks what it means. She tells him in a word, and he, realizing her fate will be death, determines to join her in an effort to fly from Russia. Disguising themselves as peasants, they succeed in evading interception and arrive safely in America. In this country he finds it impossible to obtain congenial employment, and is forced to accept a position as waiter in a swell restaurant, which he keeps secret from all but his wife. Being a gentleman born, he is successful, and when his American born son is old enough, he is able to send him to college. Later when the boy returns home from college, he is apprised of the engagement between the son and the sister of his college friend. The son is still in ignorance of the nature of his father's employment, and is warned not to marry for the present at least, the father intending to resign the waiter position as soon as possible. The young folks refuse to wait, and elope. After their marriage they receive the blessings of the girl's parents but the boy's parents are not to be located, so the party goes out to have a little wedding dinner, selecting, by singular coincidence the restaurant at which the father is employed. Amazement and embarrassment seize the entire party, and the father then tells his son why he asked him not to marry. The excitement attending this unexpected meeting arouses the notice of other occupants of the dining room, and one of their number approaches, recognizing the waiter. This man proves to be the Russian's old friend, who, after a tireless search is now given the opportunity of bestowing upon his former Chief the Czar's pardon, which restores his social standing. So culminated his troubles.

"BROTHERS."—Peter and Joe Challen are brothers and Mrs. Challen on her death bed gave the elder the charge of his brother Joe. Joe was inclined to wildness and when speculation failed to provide him with the necessary funds after the "beginner's luck" was passed he falsified his father's books and used the money thus obtained in an effort to bolster up his depleted margins. But discovery came and it was Pete who, mindful of his vow, assumed his brother's crime and was turned from home. He wandered to the north, where he slowly made headway with a promising looking mine. Later Joe joined him and sought to cut Pete out with Marion Boyd, the pretty school teacher who was a true product of the west, a good rider and a splendid shot. For a time Joe worked hard and Pete had hopes of his reform, but Marion refused to marry him and when he discovered that Pete possessed her photograph in a locket he reverted to his old habits and became the best patron of the log saloon though not always a welcomed visitor because of his evil temper while in his cups. In one of these fits of drunken rage he vows to kill Pete and starts out to find his brother. A small boy warns Marion of his declaration and Marion hurries after him. Just as he is about to fire Marion shoots and wounds him in the pistol arm. The shock sobers Joe to a realization of his narrow escape from fratricide and two years later Pete and Marion, now married, are delighted to learn of his permanent reformation.

"MIKE, THE HOUSEMAID."—No, the title is not a misprint, it's Mike the Housemaid, because things were dull in Mike's trade, and he was looking for a job. A woman advertised for a maid who could look after the silver, and looking after silver was Mike's best little stunt. In his eventful career he had looked after enough silver to stock a jewelry store and as he made a very fair looking girl and had some of the best references he could write himself he got the job. The plan was that when the silver was ready to be looked after his pal, Pete, should come and lend a hand. Pete came when Mike knew that all the family would be away, but they had not counted on Officer Clancy. Clancy liked the good things of life and he had taken a fancy to the girl he thought Mike was, so when the family went away Clancy dropped around for a bite and a chat. He got the bite, but not until Mike had hidden Pete in the shower bath curtains. Pete, in trying to get out after all was quiet, turned on the water and was nearly drowned before the water trickled down into the dining room to warn Mike that his side partner was in trouble. Just then the family returned and Clancy found himself without an excuse for being in the house when he should have been on post. He raced upstairs after Mike. Mike's wig came off in Clancy's clutch and that got Mike into trouble. He bolted for the bathroom and there Clancy found the pair of them and proudly chaperoned them downstairs to be praised for his cleverness in arresting the thieves instead of having to explain to the inspector why he was off beat.

"BIRTHDAY CIGARS."—Mrs. Damm and her children are seated on the porch when the postman arrives with a letter stating that their wealthy uncle would visit them. Mrs. Damm hustles the children into the house, and they all get busy tidying things up for the expected guest. The boy feels the importance of the event but his sister is so "lackadaisical" she can't enter into the spirit of the occasion.

Mrs. Damm in addition to numerous other provisions goes to the cigar store and orders a box of "perfectos" sent home. The tobacconist wraps up the box of "smokes" and lays them beside a box of trick explosive birthday cigars ordered by a previous customer, placing the name and address of each customer on the respective boxes.

After Mrs. Damm leaves the store a meddlesome chap comes into the cigar store, looks at the cards while the proprietor is busy and gets the addresses on the boxes mixed; the consequence is the birthday explosives are sent to Mrs. Damm and her cigars are sent elsewhere.

The anticipated uncle is met, escorted from the train by Mr. Damm and received by the whole Damm family with a hearty welcome. They remove his boots and put a pair of slippers on his feet; take off his coat and insist upon his donning a house coat. He is comfortably seated in a rocking chair, and, with much show of hospitality, the box of birthday cigars are brought to Uncle who takes one, lights it and just settles back for an enjoyable smoke—the cigar explodes with a bang.

He is furious and wants to leave the house at once; he can't stand practical jokes. The family assure him it must have been a mistake and they throw the cigars into the fireplace. Zip! Bing!! Bang!!! the whole bunch of "celebrators" go off at once and the concussion knocks the old man out of his chair and upsets the rest of the family.

Too much is plenty—the uncle packs up his things and leaves the place turning a deaf ear to the entreaties of his relatives. He gets away and there is mourning in the Damm home, although the children can't help but laugh; neither can we.

"GENEROUS CUSTOMERS."—"Business is on the Fritz," nothing to do but complain and everything seems to be going to the "demnition bow-wows." "If things get much worse I'll close up," says the restauranteur to his waiter. "And I'll give up me job," says the waiter, "if I can't get any money out of the place."

What's that? It's a "Joy wagon" with a party of tourists; they're headed for the restaurant. Immediately the proprietor and the waiter hurriedly get a move on and hustle out to receive the guests who are soon conducted into the dining-room, served, dined and wined with alacrity that is almost magical.

The host and his waiter are all smiles and are astonished as well as pleased at the liberal way in which their customers order everything and anything. Not only do they feed well but they invite the proprietor and his assistant to partake of their wine; and soon everybody is in a jovial mood.

The proprietor presents the bill to his customers and it is suggested that they blindfold the manager of the restaurant and the waiter, and the first one of the diners who is caught by them will have to pay the bill. The two men are much pleased with the idea and, after the handkerchiefs are tied over their eyes and while they are groping about the room, the customers all escape and make off in their automobile just as the proprietor and his assistant make a lively dash after the departing guests.

Gloom surrounds the refectory, and while the men of victuals are kicking themselves and denouncing each other, a messenger comes in with a note from the waggish patrons inclosing a check in payment for the dinner and a forty-dollar tip for the waiter.

Joy takes the place of gloom and the two happy men fall in fond ecstatic embrace in each other's arms.

"THE KEY OF LIFE."—The latest film with Mlle. Pilar Morin in the principal role is a distinct departure from any of the preceding stories in which she has been cast. It opens in the land of mystery, India, and suddenly transfers its scenes of action to New York City.

The first view shows the death of an old Brahmin priest and his presentation to his favorite pupil, a young American artist, of the sacred robe of Krishna, together with a copy of the divine Book of Mysteries, with an injunction to search for the key of life which is hidden in the book, and with which the robe itself is somehow concerned. Then we see the young man in his studio in New York, surrounded with symbols of his studies and evidences of his life in other countries. He is reading the book of mysteries while his little sister is studying the laws of love, in company with a young man who is evidently her tutor. The girl plays with a little kitten and when their love scene passes and the betrothal announced to the brother (who can hardly take his attention from his Book of Mysteries long enough to announce a hurried blessing on them), the kitten is left upon the brother's desk while he continues his studies alone. Suddenly he comes upon a paragraph which he has read without understanding before. When it is flashed upon the screen, it tells us that reincarnation is the key of life, and that, wrapped in the robe of Krishna, if the ninth invocation be said before the

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th

Nature Has Placed Nothing So High That the Vitagraph Cannot Reach It. This Surpasses All Previous Efforts in Dramatic Value and Mightiness of Action. Length, 978 Feet.

WAY up in the mountains of Kentucky, Jake, a moonshiner, lives in a shack with his wife Sally far from the rest of the world, with the least possible chance of being disturbed by the Revenue officers who are constantly on the lookout for illicit stills and distillers of whiskey.

Jake is a typical mountaineer, and his wife "Sal"—well, she is a woman whose love for Jake has made her little better than a slave and subject of small consideration for one of Jake's coarse and brutal nature.

Sally's cousin Sue writes that she is not very well and will visit Sally for a change and a rest. She comes to the mountain home and immediately Jake begins to show her marked attention, ignores his wife, who becomes extremely jealous, rightly so, and resents the familiarity of her husband and her cousin. Sue is a vixen and seems to delight in the torture and indignities to which she is subjecting the poor wife.

Driven to a frenzy, Sally betrays Jake to the Sheriff and Revenue officers, who arrest him. He tries to strike his frail wife, and turns to Sue for sympathy, but she is indifferent about his misfortune, pleased in receiving the attention from one of the officers who is chucking her under the chin and winking at her, and she pays no attention to Jake as he is taken away to jail.

This is a brilliant piece of acting, but is dwarfed by the fury of Sal when she is left alone with her cousin Sue. She turns on the intruder, drives her from the house with inflamed frenzy, hurls her belongings after her and falls exhausted against the door.

A year later Jake is released from prison and makes his way to his mountain home, bent upon killing his wife. Arriving at the cabin, he looks in the window and then creeps cautiously through the door, holding a large club in his hand, as he sees his wife sitting in a chair unaware of his presence. Just as he raises the club to strike her, he sees for the first time his infant child, which his wife holds tenderly to her bosom. She kisses the child and lifts it up so it looks into its father's face. He drops the cudgel and kneels reverently at his wife's feet, asks her if she can forgive him. She does. His heart is touched and his nature seems transformed and purified. This is a climax that rends every emotion of tenderness in our being and acts like a benediction of peace to our souls.

A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 1st

A Refined Comedy of Complication and Mistakes Which Are Finally Righted and End Happily in the Marriage of the Elopers, With the Blessings of the Old Folks. Length, 999 Feet.

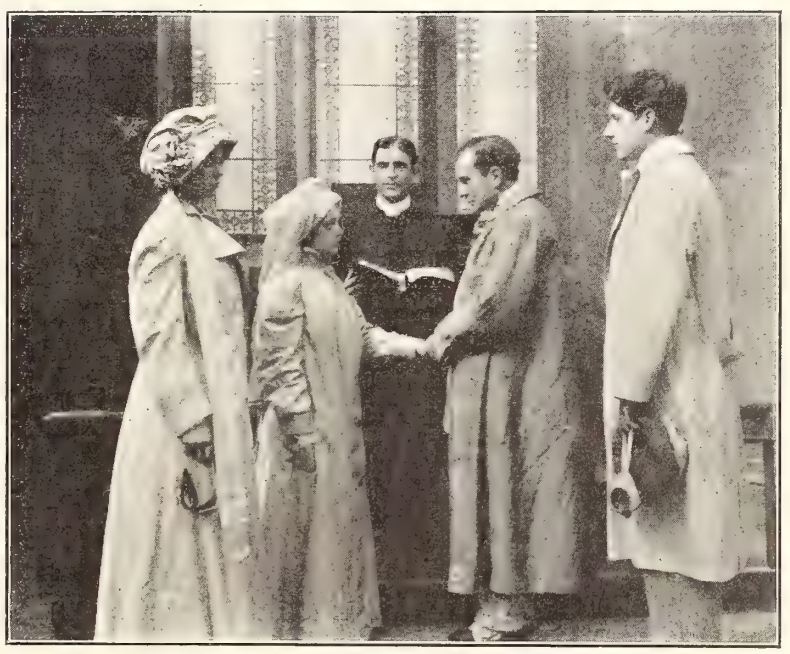
TWO young girls and two young men each in love with the other. The two girls are "Daisies," Daisy White and Daisy Brown. Jack Larkin is in love with Daisy White, and Tom Durkin is in love with Daisy Brown. The young couples plan an elopement and both hit upon the same means of eluding their parents and circumventing the objections of the girls' parents. Miss White agrees to meet Jack at a certain point and by coincidence Miss Brown agrees to meet Tom at the same place.

Each one of the young couples, unknown to the other, dress in long auto coats and goggles. The girls leave notes for their parents and go out to meet their lovers. Daisy White gets to the place of meeting, in the darkness and hurry Tom Durkin comes with his auto, thinks she is Miss Brown, takes her into the car and they speed on their way to the hotel at Marshallton. Jack Larkin now appears, picks up Daisy Brown, thinking she is Miss White, and makes haste to the Marshallton Hotel. In the meantime Mrs. White and Mr. Brown discover the elopement of their daughters and make a hot chase after the two girls.

Mrs. White reaches the hotel, goes to the room where Miss Brown and Jack have learned their mistake, and she finds Daisy Brown instead of her daughter. She makes haste to get on the trail again as soon as possible and decamps. Mr. Brown reaches the hotel, finds Miss White with Tom, who have also discovered their mistake. Old Brown is chagrined and disappointed at not finding his daughter, resumes the hunt and gets away as quickly as he can.

Jack hears the talk in the next room where Tom and Daisy White are, and he and Daisy Brown go in, and the four of them hasten to the nearest church, where they are married.

Just as they are leaving the church they find Mr. Brown and Mrs. White seated on the doorsteps exhausted, defeated in their efforts to prevent the marriages. Tney forgive the young folks, happily accept the situation and make their ways back home arm in arm.



THE CHILDREN'S REVOLT

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4

A Picture Play of How Two Children Object to the Restraints of Too Much Restriction, Love and Attention. You Can't Put Old Heads on Young Shoulders. Children Will Be Children, and There is No Use of Dwarfing Their Natures. Length, 992 Feet.

OVER-INDULGED and pampered; restrained and hampered by nurses and the "don'ts" of too much solicitude, the two children of wealthy parents long for freedom and show that they are in many respects quite as natural as most children and a little more unmanageable.

On the train going to the country for the summer they insist upon indulging themselves in candy, lemonade and everything that comes in sight, and then showing an utter disregard for them and less consideration for their parents who cater to their selfish whims.

At the seashore the children are kept under the espionage of nurse, governess and parents who will not permit them out of their sight. Naturally, the children long to play with the other youngsters, and whenever they get a chance they break away from their guardians and get together with the other boys and girls on the beach, but they don't escape the vigilance of the nurse and governess, and are soon brought back to the straight and narrow path mapped out for them.

Their little hearts long for freedom and they declare a revolt by getting out of their beds early in the morning, escaping while the nurse is yet asleep. They make a day of it, and the way they do mix in with the children, giving vent to every childish inclination, romping, bathing and boating—it does you good to see it.

When the parents and nurses discover the absence of their cherubs, they start out in search of them. The two young ones elude them several times, but they catch up with them just as they are starting out for a row in an old boat they find along the shore. The father rushes into the water, seizes his little girl from the boat, and a friend gets the boy. The parents rejoice at the recovery of their dear ones, and they are quickly taken home.

Snugly tucked in bed by the nurse, who has no sooner left the room than the two truants get together to discuss the doings of the day and comment on the good time they had and the liberty they enjoyed. They kis and are soon in the land of nod, dreaming dreams of happy childhood days.

shrine of Brahma, a reincarnation will take place. Getting the robe of Krishna, he opens its wrapings and unfolds it to view. Then possessed with a desire to see the miracle, he looks about him for an object which shall pass through the stages from animal life to humanity. He lights upon the little kitten, which he places in a bowl, draping over it the robe of Krishna, while he repeats the invocation before the shrine of Brahma. A light vapor rises from the bowl and then suddenly the bowl and kitten disappear, and a sort of human kitten stands upon the pedestal. She is rather a charming young woman with cat-like qualities, which become more evident as he becomes better acquainted with her. He helps her down from the pedestal and admires her beauty, playing with her as he would a kitten. She alternately rubs against him and scratches his hand. Then suddenly, just when he feels that he has begun to teach her the human feeling of love, she darts after the bird in the cage and he only catches her in time to protect it. A little later she makes the discovery of the cream in the pitcher, which she wants to lap up. He shows her how to drink properly, but it is evidently not the natural way for her. With kitten-like curiosity she plays with a dagger until she scratches her finger. Then he shows her how dangerous a thing it is to tamper with, and finally after much patience and coaxing he succeeds in making her understand a little of love, and is just about to seal the understanding with a kiss when he hears a sound at the door; his sister returning. Lest his position and that of the kitten-woman be misunderstood, he secretes her behind the curtain and admits his sister, who announces a shopping exposition, kisses him and leaves him alone again. But that kiss has been enough to rouse the cat-like jealousy of the reincarnated one, and she flies into a rage, which he, with difficulty, restrains. Then she releases herself and seizing the dagger makes a vicious lunge at him, which just grazes his shoulder. He takes it away from her and drops to his seat, his head upon his hands in despair. Then slowly the reincarnated one begins to understand that she is neither cat or human, and despair fills her, because of the attack upon the man who would have loved her. She seizes the dagger and is about to end her own human existence when suddenly a vision of Brahma in the clouds appears and stays her hand. Ascending the steps of the shrine she turns and faces the now awakened artist and tells him that she understands his situation and goes back to her million lives on the way from cathood to womanhood again, in regular order. As he steps forward, her face changes to more of that of the cat, and suddenly she is gone entirely. Turning around, he discovers the bowl, the robe of Krishna and the kitten again as when the incarnation at first began.

"BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA."—The interest in this film lies not so much in what it shows, although from a purely pictorial standpoint it is sure to attract attention, as in the underlying idea which it represents. The Boy Scouts' movement was started in England by Lieut.-General Sir Robert S. S. Baden Powell, K. C. S., where it met with immediate response, and is being developed in this country through the study of woodcraft as preached by Ernest Thompson Seton. The organization, founded on the broadest lines, is open to any boy of twelve or over. It need not necessarily be a separate organization, that is to say, any club of boys can add the scouts' organization to their present one by the application of the proper forms and methods. It is graded from the chief scout down through a number of officers to the lowest degree, which is called "tenderfoot," and comprises the newest boys before they have learned enough to pass the first test and become second-class scouts. The main ideas are to encourage nature study, to be always honorable and loyal, and, as the scout law has it, "to be prepared, which means you are always to be in a state of readiness in mind and body to do your duty."

"RIDERS OF THE PLAINS."—At Regina, Canada, a town of about forty-five thousand, is situated the headquarters of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police of Canada, the most perfect body of men on horseback in the world. Not alone are they wonderful horsemen, but brave and absolutely fearless, and known as the "untiring hunters of the law." In fact, they are the law and order of Northwest Canada. This wonderful body of men does duty over an enormous area of land, larger than that covered by any organization of its kind in the world. These riders, with their red coats and blue trousers and the cowboy hat, can be seen away up in the frozen North, upon the hot, burning prairie lands and in gorges and trails of the mountains. In presenting "The Riders of the Plains" to the public, the Edison Company takes considerable pride, because the participants are not make-believe actors. Although the greater part of this film is a story picture, nevertheless the actors are the real things. The Indians are real Indians and the cowboys are real cowboys. The story was suggested by one of the commanding officers of this body of men and carried out under his instructions, as showing what has occurred time and time again in the annals of their life.

The entire story deals with horse stealing by the Indians. The mounted police are shown on post duty discovering the facts, reporting at Calgary headquarters, and then a detachment go out to bring forth the guilty redmen, and we may be sure at this point that they will do so, for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are not allowed to return empty-handed. They will follow their prey for hundreds of miles if necessary. Eventually the picture winds up with the capture of the redmen and their being brought to the prison at the Northwest Mounted Police Station at Calgary.

"THE LITTLE STATION AGENT."—Few people stop to think while leaning back on the soft cushions of a Pullman palace car as it goes whirling on through the night that their very lives are within the keeping of someone miles away in some little wayside station. Nevertheless, a moment's neglect, the slightest bit of forgetfulness in carrying out the orders that come ticking, ticking over the miles of wire, would mean the loss of perhaps hundreds of lives. A vast railroad system may be perfect in every detail, yet often human frailty, passion, hate, revenge, crops in and an accident is possible. No precaution could have prevented it. The system may have been right, but humanity is weak. Just to counterbalance the weakness of one, another may be exceedingly strong, alert and quick to action. This is just the condition that is so aptly portrayed in the Edison latest motion picture, "The Little Station Agent."

The action takes place in the heart of the Canadian Rockies and at the summit of the great divide. The station agent is a girl of about nineteen years of age, and one of those sweet winsome girlies who win the admiration of all who come around her. Joe Allen and Albert Hill, two freight men, are particularly smitten with her charms. At the opening of the picture she smiles at one and bows to the other with equal womanly grace, but ere the silent drama has scarcely begun to unfold itself before our eyes, we perceive that Joe Allen is far in the lead as regards her affections. This fact is also revealed to Albert Hill, and the green-eyed monster presently begins to gnaw into the cells of his reason till, while setting the brakes of the box cars when going down a steep grade, Albert meets Joe on the top of the train. The little station agent is the subject of their conversation, which wages into an argument, then hot words and a blow is struck. The cars go dashing on, the two men are reeling and swaying in a terrific struggle. A blow with a lantern knocks the favored one, Joe, unconscious. Albert thinks he has killed him, and realizing the punishment that will follow if he is found out, he determines to destroy the evidence of the crime by cutting the cars loose and letting them with them. This will enable him to hide his guilt, and so the cars are cut loose and go tearing down the mountain grade, but Joe soon comes to consciousness and awakens to find himself on a mad runaway freight. He strains every nerve and cord in his body at the brakes, but to no avail. A glimmer of hope arrives as he dashes by a way station. The station master hears his cry and rushing into his office sends a wire to the little station agent. A moment and the news stuns her, but it means Joe's life; it means more than that, it means the safety of the Overland Limited. Ten minutes have hardly passed before we see the track superintendent, the little station agent and an engineer dashing out of the roundhouse on a high-speed emergency track automobile, and away for the oncoming freight. Now we are shown the train dashing around dangerous curves and now the track automobile running for life, love and humanity's sake. At last the siding switch is reached a moment only and the runaway freight is sidetracked and safe. In the next instant the Overland Limited comes tearing down the track and off in the distance. No one ever knew who had saved their lives, how near death they nearly were, but Joe knew to whom he owed his life, and the next day when Albert Hill was arrested the little station agent slipped her hand into Joe's and somehow we feel it is just these little tragic moments of life that bring two souls together.

"MAX HAS TROUBLE WITH HIS EYES."—Max's eyes are in a bad state. He has laid aside his little mannerisms and is solemnly stumbling about his room and gravely apologizing to lamp-posts and brick walls. He is even obliged to resort to a big magnifying glass to read his sweetheart's letters. At a cafe his affliction causes him to kiss a strange lady in place of his own divinity. A fencing master sitting at an adjoining table insists that the matter can only be settled by a duel. What happens at the duel is too funny for words, but when you see the film you will laugh heartily.

"NEW STYLE INKWELL."—Peter makes a present of a new-style inkwell to his master, who upon picking up the article to examine its methods of working, receives a jet of ink in his face. Delighted with the success of his trick, Peter again secures the inkstand at a favorable opportunity, and looks for fresh victims. A young man making love to a girl is temporarily disfigured to the hilarious amusement of his divinity, and an unsuspecting schoolmate is similarly badly treated, whilst peaceable pedestrians suffer incalculable damage to their clothes and tempers. Peter at last wends his way to school, arrives late, is reprimanded, and brings into play again the terrible inkwell. Master and scholars are alike be-

"DARJILING."—An interesting scenic film which gives a vivid impression of this town which, owing to its being one of the most northerly in India, is ferquented as a summer resort by the Europeans.

"COWBOY JUSTICE."—Three western bravadoes sitting in the Dewdrop saloon plot to attack the station agent and rob the railroad company of the valuable consignment that they know will be there that day. Sneaking quietly along the rails, they enter the depot and creep into the waiting room and shoot at the agent in the inner room. He, after shooting one of them dead, drops with a wound in his wrist.

He sees that discretion is the best policy in the face of the overwhelming force, and pretends to be dead. The two villains blow the lock off the strong box and take the contents. Making for the main road they stop an automobile at the point of their guns, and mounting, force the driver to take them along. Meantime the agent, though faint from loss of blood, telephones the sheriff, who, together with his deputies, start off. Arriving at the station they receive full particulars from the agent and commence the pursuit. From a handkerchief found on the road, and which they pick up while galloping at full pace, they see that they are on the right track, a fact which is also confirmed when they come across the driver of the auto bound by his machine, the gasolene having given out. A little further on they come to a ranch from which the two desperadoes had stolen horses to continue their flight. Augmented by these aggrieved parties, the sheriff and his band continue the spirited chase across rough country until they gain sufficiently to be able to shoot one of the ruffians from his horse. The remaining thief, thoroughly frightened, takes to the water, where he is easily captured and led back to receive the punishment he so richly deserves.

"THE FACORI FAMILY."—An acrobatic picture of great merit. Some of the feats performed fairly make one hold one's breath.

"THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA."—The scenes open with Jesus in the act of performing miracles before leaving Jerusalem with His disciples. He passes through Samaria, where the people mock both Him and His followers, and finally He comes to Jacob's well. Here, wearied with His journey, He seats Himself, while the disciples go into the town to buy food.

To the well also comes a Samaritan woman to draw water, and Jesus asks her to moisten His parched lips. The woman at first refuses, protesting that the Samartians can have no dealings with the Jews, but the words of the Stranger proving to her that she is speaking to the Messiah, she raises her pitcher so that He may drink. She then runs into the city to announce the news, afterwards returning to the well to beg Jesus to accompany her to her own people, whose slower moving feet she has outstripped. Jesus complies, and the Samaritans, whose mockery and incredulity die away on their lips as they perceive the Messiah, acclaim Him joyfully.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S CLEMENCY."—The incidents pictured in this film are founded on fact and relate to William Scott, a young soldier from the state of Vermont. Scott is on guard after a heavy day's march, and being found asleep is placed under arrest. He is tried by court martial and sentenced to death. Meantime we see President Lincoln in his study at the White House in deep thought, and seeing a vision of the Civil War and the sorrow caused by it. The vision disappears and he reads a letter from Mrs. Scott pleading for the pardon of her son. Deeply affected, he lays the letter down and sees another vision—that of the gray-haired mother and a nameless grave. We next see Scott being marched off to the spot where he is to be shot. All is in readiness for the fatal word of command to be given, when through a cloud of dust a coach dashes up attended by outriders. The President steps out and pardons the prisoner, who falls on his knees and blesses him. The next scene is that of a battle with the Union soldiers retreating. The color bearer falls, but William Scott rushes up, grasps the flag and rallies the Union troops, but amid the dreadful carnage he himself is shot. That night the doctors and ambulances are searching among the dead for the wounded who are still alive. They reach Scott. He is dying. A vision of the President appears before him, giving him a wreath of fame. Scott staggers to his feet, and as the vision fades away, drops dead. As a fitting climax, we see a tableau of President Lincoln taking from a Union and a Confederate color bearer their respective flags, rolling them together and when they are unrolled displaying the Stars and Stripes.

"A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT."—Two young girls and two young men, each in love with the other. The two girls are "Daisies," Daisy White and Daisy Brown. Jack Larkin is in love with Daisy White, and Tom Durkin is in love with Daisy Brown. The young couples plan an elopement, and both hit upon the same means of eluding their parents and circumventing the objections of the girls' parents. Miss White agrees to meet Jack at a certain point, and by coincidence Miss Brown agrees to meet Tom at the same place.

Each one of the young couples, unknown to the other, dress in long auto coats and goggles. The girls leave notes for their parents and go out to meet their lovers. Daisy White gets to the place of meeting; in the darkness and hurry, Tom Durkin comes with his auto, thinks she is Miss Brown, takes her into the car and they speed on their way to the hotel at Marshallton. Jack Larkin now appears, picks up Daisy Brown, thinking she is Miss White, and makes haste to the Marshallton Hotel. In the meantime Mrs. White and Mr. Brown discover the elopement of their daughters and make a hot chase after the two girls.

Mrs. White reaches the hotel, goes to the room where Miss Brown and Jack have learned their mistake, and she finds Daisy Brown instead of her daughter. She makes haste to get on the trail again as soon as possible and decamps. Mr. Brown reaches the hotel, finds Miss White with Tom, who have also discovered their mistake. Old Brown is chagrined and disappointed at not finding his daughter, resumes the hunt and gets away as quickly as he can.

Jack hears the talk in the next room, where Tom and Daisy White are, and he and Daisy Brown go in, and the four of them hasten to the nearest church, where they are married.

Just as they are leaving the church they find Mr. Brown and Mrs. White seated on the doorsteps exhausted, defeated in their efforts to prevent the marriages. They forgive the young folks, happily accept the situation and make their way back home arm in arm.

"THE CHILDREN'S REVOLT."—Over-indulged and pampered, restrained and hampered by nurses and the "don'ts" of too much solicitude, the two children of wealthy parents long for freedom, and show that they are in many respects quite as natural as most children and a little more unmanageable.

On the train going to the country for the summer they insist upon indulging themselves in candy, lemonade and everything that comes in sight, and then showing an utter disregard for them and less consideration for their parents, who cater to their selfish whims.

At the seashore the children are kept under the espionage of nurse, governess and parents, who will not prmit them out of their sight. Naturally, the children long to play with the other youngsters, and whenever they get a chance they break away from their guardians and get together with the other boys and girls on the beach, but they don't escape the vigilance of the nurse and governess, and are soon brought back to the straight and narrow path mapped out for them.

Their little hearts long for freedom and they declare a revolt by getting out of their beds early in the morning, escaping while the nurse is yet asleep. They make a day of it, and the way they do mix in with the children, giving vent to every childish inclination, romping, bathing and boating; it does you good to see it.

When the parents and nurses discover the absence of their cherubs they start out in search of them; the two young ones elude them several times, but they catch up with them just as they are starting out for a row in an old boat they find along the shore. The father rushes into the water, seizes his little girl from the boat and a friend gets the boy. The parents rejoice at the recovery of their dear ones, and they are quickly taken home.

Snugly tucked in bed by the nurse, who has no sooner left the room than the two truants get together to discuss the doings of the day and comment on the good time they had and the liberty then enjoyed. They kiss and are soon in the land of nod, dreaming dreams of happy childhood days.

"IN THE MOUNTAINS OF KENTUCKY."—Way up in the mountains of Kentucky, Jake, a moonshiner, lives in a shack with his wife Sally, far from the rest of the world, with the least possible chance of being disturbed by the revenue officers, who are constantly on the lookout for illicit stills and distillers of whiskey.

Jake is a typical mountaineer, and his wife "Sal"—well, she is a woman whose love for Jake has made her little better than a slave and subject of small consideration for one of Jake's coarse and brutal nature.

Sally's cousin Sue writes that she is not very well and will visit Sally for a change and a rest. She comes to the mountain home and immediately Jake begins to show her marked attention, ignores his wife, who becomes extremely jealous, rightly so, and resents the familiarity of her husband and her cousin. Sue is a vixen, and seems to delight in the torture and indignities to which she is subjecting the poor wife.

Driven to a frenzy, Sally betrays Jake to the sheriff and revenue officers, who arrest him. He tries to strike his frail wife and turns to Sue for sympathy, but she is indifferent about his misfortune, pleased in receiving the attention from one of the officers, who is chucking her under the chin and winking at her, and she pays no attention to Jake as he is taken away to jail.
